- (1) The verdict of a jury is conclusive though the Judge disagrees with it unless he considers it fit to submit the case to the High Court under S 307. But in a trial with the aid of assessors the Judge is not bound to pronounce judgment in accordance with the opinions of the assessors although in delivering his judgment he is bound to take into consideration the opinions of the assessors. - (2) The jury form a body and their verdict is the verdict of the body. Put it in the case of a trial with the aid of assessors the assessors do not form a body each acts and expresses his opinion individually. See Note 5
- (2) In the case of a trial by jury the Judge's charge to the jury is an essential part of the procedure while in a trial with the aid of assessors it is left to the discretion of the Judge whether or not to sum up the evidence to them. See Note 2
- (4) The jury are entitled to retire for mutual consultation before delivering their verdict the assessors are not so entitled although the Judge may permit such consultation. See Note 4

2 Summing up of evidence by Judge to assessors — While it is obligatory on the Judge to charge the jury summing up the evidence and laying down the law by which they are to be guided (s 297) this section confers a discretion on the Court to sum up the evidence for the prosecution and the defence¹ This provision was first introduced into the section in the Code of 1882² but even prior to it it was held that the Court had a discretion to sum up the evidence for the benefit of the assessors³ The object of the provision is to enable the Sessions Judge in long or intricate cases to place the evidence in an intelligible form before the assessors so as to assist them in arriving at a reasonable conclusion, the provision should be resorted to only in such cases⁴ In summing up the evidence the Judge should not obtrude on the assessors his own opinion on the value of the evidence⁵ When at the same trial, an accused is tried by jury for some offences and by the Court with the aid of the jurors as assessors for other offences (s 269 sub s (3)) the Judge in summing up the evidence should explain to the jurors the double capacity in which they are acting⁶ As to the recording of the summing up, see the undermentioned case⁷

3 Delivery of opinions of assessors — In a trial by a Sessions Court with the aid of assessors, the Judge is not bound to deliver judgment in conformity with the opinions of assessors (see Note 13), but he is bound to take the opinions of the assessors before convicting or acquitting the accused¹ Even where the accused admits his guilt (after the prosecution evidence, in a case where originally he pleaded not guilty) he cannot be convicted without taking such opinions² The power (under s 289) to record a finding of not guilty and acquit the accused at the conclusion of the case for the prosecution without calling on the accused to enter on his defence and without recording the opinions of the assessors is confined to cases where there is no evidence in support of the prosecution Where such is not the case the Judge is bound to record the opinions of the assessors under this section though he considers the evidence for the prosecution to be unreliable³ The ommission to ask for and record opinions is not a mere irregularity curable under s 534⁴. But where a prosecution is withdrawn under S 491, the accused is entitled to be acquitted irrespective of the opinions of the assessors and such opinions need not be recorded before he is acquitted⁵.

The opinions of the assessors must be given in open Court. The failure to do so must amount to such disregard of the forms of justice as to lead to substantial and grave injustice⁶ and cannot be cured under s 537.

4 Retirement of assessors to consider their opinions.—This section makes no provision as to the right of the assessors to retire to consider their opinions (compare s 300 in the case of jurors). The matter is left to the discretion of the Judge. Though he may in his discretion allow the assessors to consult each other before giving their opinions¹, he is not bound to do so as he is entitled to have before him the independent and individual opinion of each of the assessors².

5 Each assessor to be asked his opinion.—In a trial by jury, the jury form a body and the verdict is that of the body. But in a trial by the Court with the aid of assessors the assessors do not form a body, but each assessor acts and expresses his opinion individually¹. Hence it is the duty of the Judge to ask each assessor individually his opinion and record it separately². Where the opinions of some of the assessors are not asked for and recorded the trial is vitiated by an *illegality*³ But where the opinions of all the assessors are asked for the fact that on its being found that all of them are of the same opinion such opinion is recorded in a joint statement, instead of separately, is only an irregularity curable by section 53⁴

6 Assessors' opinions to be stated orally.—The section requires the opinions of the assessors to be stated orally. The submission of written opinions by the assessors is not contemplated by the section¹ But the giving of opinions in writing is only an irregularity which will not vitiate the proceedings unless it has occasioned a failure of justice²

7 Opinion to be given on all the charges — A distinct opinion on each charge on which the accused has been tried must be taken and recorded¹ It has been held by the Oudh Chief Court that a failure to comply with the section in this respect renders the trial illegal²

8 Conviction for offence different from that on which opinions of assessors were taken — After the opinions of the assessors have been taken it is not open to the Court to add to or alter the charge (s 227) But if a case falls within the purview of s 237 or s 238 the accused can be convicted of an offence different from that on which the opinions of the assessors were taken¹ Thus where the accused is charged under s 302 Penal Code (murder) and the opinions of the assessors are taken on such charge it is open to the Session Judge (in a proper case) under s 237 to convict the accused under s 301 of the Penal Code (causing disappearance of evidence of the offence by removing the dead body) though the opinions of the assessors are not taken on such offence² Similarly (in a proper case) an accused can be convicted under s 403 Penal Code (criminal misappropriation) though the charge against him was under s 395 Penal Code (dacoity) and the opinions of the assessors were taken only on such charge³ The High Court of Allahabad has expressed the view that in such a case it would be better if the Judge elicits the opinion of the assessors on such a charge also but his not doing so is a mere irregularity and cannot vitiate the trial⁴

9. Recording of opinions. — The opinions of assessors should be recorded correctly¹ and fully² They should be recorded in the very words used by each assessor immediately after he delivers his opinion³ It was held in the undermentioned case⁴ that the failure to record the opinions of the assessors vitiated the proceedings and that the conviction must be set aside.

10. Questioning assessors — This section empowers the Judge to ask the assessors such questions as are necessary to ascertain what their opinions are Thus if there is anything obscure in the opinions expressed by the assessors, the Judge can clear up the obscurity by questioning the assessors¹ Sometimes it may become the duty of the Judge to assist the assessors by putting them specific questions concerning the facts of the case Thus, when there is a mixed question of fact and law to be decided, as for instance a question of private defence, it may be necessary to ask the assessors specific questions on the facts on which the law will turn² But the Judge should allow the assessors in the first instance, to give their opinions in their own way and when they have completed their statements, it would be open to him to question them to elucidate their opinions³ In questioning the assessors they should first be asked to give their opinions as to what happened and then if necessary, to give a further opinion on such matters as intention, knowledge, etc⁴

11. Reasons for opinions, if may be asked — There is a conflict of decisions as to whether the assessors may be asked to give reasons for their opinions In a decision of the Madras High Court it has been held that, as in the case of jurors, so also in the case of assessors, the Judge ought not to ask the assessors to give reasons for their opinions beyond what is necessary to decide whether they have understood the case¹ On the other hand, it has been held by the Bombay High Court that the assessors can and should be asked to give reasons for their opinions² A similar view was held by the Calcutta High Court in certain old decisions³ The Chief Courts of the Punjab and Lower Burma were consideration such opinions² and although there is no express provision in the Code making it obligatory on the Judge to discuss in his judgment the opinions of the assessors still, as a matter of practice, it is desirable that he should do so³

The sub section applies only to cases which are actually tried with the aid of assessors. Where a case which is so triable is, as a matter of fact, tried by jury, the Judge cannot treat the verdict of the jury as the opinions of assessors and pronounce judgment contrary to the verdict, but he must, if he disagrees with it, proceed under S 307⁴

The opinions of the assessors which a Judge can take into account in pronouncing his judgment are opinions based on the evidence in the case. The Judge cannot refer in his judgment to the opinion of an assessor based on the latter's personal knowledge⁵

See the undermentioned cases⁶ which lean on the weight to be attached to the opinions of the assessors

14 Opinions of assessors recorded by one Judge—Judgment delivered by his successor — Legality. — Where after hearing part of a case a Judge is transferred or goes on leave, his successor must hear the case de novo from the beginning and not only from the point at which the previous Judge left the case¹. Even where the previous Judge is transferred or goes on leave after the opinions of the assessors have been recorded the successor cannot pronounce judgment without hearing the case de novo from the beginning and taking the opinions of the assessors over again² (Compare S 330 in the case of Magistrates)

15 Sentence — If the accused is convicted the Court has no discretion unless it decides to proceed under s 502, to refuse to pass sentence according to law¹ and, if the accused is found guilty on several charges, the Court is bound to pass sentence on each of the charges²

The responsibility for the sentence rests with the Judge alone and where he differs from the assessors as regards conviction he should not let their opinion weigh with him regarding the sentence. Hence, the fact that the assessors gave their opinions that the accused was not guilty is no reason for passing a lesser sentence³

I — Procedure in case of Previous Conviction.

310. In the case of a trial by a jury or with the aid of assessors when the accused is charged with an offence and further charged that he is by reason of a previous conviction liable to enhanced punishment or to punishment of a different kind for such subsequent offence, the procedure prescribed by the foregoing provisions of this Chapter shall be modified as follows, namely —

(a) Such further charge shall not be read out in Court and the accused shall not be asked to plead thereto, nor shall the same be referred to by the prosecution, or any evidence adduced thereon unless and until,

(i) he has been convicted of the subsequent offence, or

(ii) the jury have delivered their verdict, or the opinions of the assessors have been recorded, on the charge of the subsequent offence

(b) In the case of a trial held with the aid of assessors, the Court may, in its discretion, proceed or refrain from proceeding with the trial of the accused on the charge of the previous conviction.

1. Legislative changes. — This section has been substituted for the original section by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923

Under the section as it stood before the amendment the accused could be asked about his previous conviction only if he pleaded guilty to or was convicted of the subsequent offence. The Court could not ask him about it where the jury had given a verdict and the Court without convicting him, made a reference to the High Court under s 30¹. This disability has now been removed.

2. Scope and object of the section. — This provision of law has been taken from the English Statute law, 6 & 7 William IV, Chap 3¹. It is based on the principle that a prisoner on his trial ought not to be prejudiced by a statement of a previous conviction suffered by him². The section is imperative³. It is most essential that the procedure prescribed by it should be conducted with precision, regularity and close adherence to the rules laid down in this section⁴. This section indicates the importance of the complete exclusion of the knowledge of previous conviction when weighing the evidence as to the truth or otherwise of the main charge⁵.

It has been held in the undermentioned case⁶ that the fact that an accused is a registered member of a criminal tribe under the Criminal Tribes Act, 6 [VI] of 1921,—a fact from which bad character can be inferred—should not, on the analogy of this section be disclosed to the jury until after their verdict, lest their minds should be prejudiced.

The section is applicable to trials before the Court of Session only and does not apply to trials before Magistrate⁷. As to trials before Magistrates, see section 255A.

3. When previous conviction should be referred to.—The accused should not be asked about his previous conviction nor his plea should be taken thereto until after—

(1) his conviction for the subsequent offence,¹ or

(2) the jury have delivered their verdict² or the opinions of the assessors have been recorded on the charge for the subsequent offence³

The record should invariably show that no reference to the previous conviction was made until one or the other of the conditions mentioned in the section has happened⁴

Where a charge of previous conviction is tried the accused cannot be examined about his previous conviction in such trial unless there is on the record some legally admissible evidence to show the fact of the previous conviction⁵ See Section 312

4. Non compliance with the section — A non compliance with the provisions of this section is only an irregularity which will not vitiate the trial unless the accused is shown to have been prejudiced thereby¹

311. Notwithstanding anything in the last foregoing section, evi-

When evidence of previous conviction may be given for the subsequent offence, if the fact of the previous conviction is relevant under the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

a This section was added as the 1st paragraph of S 310 of the Code of 1882 by Act 3 [III] of 1891 and took the place of S 311* of the Code of 1882, which was repealed by Act 12 [III] of 1891

1. Scope. — The guilt of a person accused of an offence is to be established by proof of the facts and not by proof of his character. A previous conviction may be proved to show the offender's character. But such evidence might create a prejudice but not lead a step towards substantiation of guilt. Hence, S 310 delays the proof of such previous conviction to a stage after the conviction, or the delivery of a verdict by the jury, or the recording of opinions of assessors, as the case may be. However, if the fact of the previous conviction is relevant under the provisions of the Evidence Act, the present section provides that the evidence of the same need not be delayed but may be given at the trial of the subsequent offence, notwithstanding S 310.

The relevancy of a previous conviction is to be determined by a reference to the sections of the Evidence Act. Such evidence is inadmissible save in a few, well defined and exceptional circumstances¹. Under S 51, Evidence Act, a previous conviction is relevant as evidence of bad character. But a previous conviction is not admissible in evidence against the accused unless evidence of good character be given by him, in which case the fact that the accused has been previously convicted of an offence is admissible as evidence of bad character. A previous conviction may also be relevant under S 43 (see illustrations (e) and (f)) and S 8 Evidence Act as showing motive. It is also relevant under S 14 Evidence Act, when the existence of any state of mind such as intention, knowledge, etc., or evidence of any state of body or bodily feeling is in issue or relevant (see illustration (b))². For instance where a person was charged with the offence of belonging to a gang of persons associated for purpose of habitually committing dacoity, it was held that the proof of a previous conviction was admissible under S 14 of the Evidence Act, having regard to the character of the offence attributed to the accused³.

2 "May prescribe the number" — Under the section as it stood before the amendment it was provided that not more than four hundred persons should at any one time be entered in the special jurors list. Under the present section as amended by Act 12 [VII] of 1923, the High Court is empowered to prescribe the number of special jurors. The proviso is intended to secure a list which should include all persons qualified to whatever nationality they may belong.

313.† (i) The Clerk of the Crown shall, before the first day of April in each year, and subject to such rules as the High Court from time to time prescribes, prepare —

(a) a list of all persons liable to serve as common jurors, and

(b) a list of persons liable to serve as special jurors only

(2) Regard shall be had, in the preparation of the latter list, to the property, character and education of the persons whose names are entered therein

(3) No person shall be entitled to have his name entered in the special jurors' list merely because he may have been entered in the special jurors' list for a previous year.

^a[(4) The Provincial Government may exempt any salaried servant of the Crown from serving as a juror.]

(5) The Clerk of the Crown shall, subject to such rules as aforesaid, have full discretion to prepare the said list as seems to him to be proper, and there shall be no appeal from, or review of, his decision

315.[†] (1) Out of the persons named in the revised lists aforesaid, there shall be summoned for each sessions in the town which is the usual place of sitting of each High Court as many of those who are liable to serve on special or common juries respectively as the Clerk of the Crown considers necessary.

(2) No person shall be so summoned more than once in six months unless the number cannot be made up without him

(3) If, during the continuance of any sessions, it appears that the Supplementary number of persons so summoned is not sufficient, such summons number as may be necessary of other persons liable to serve as aforesaid shall be summoned for such sessions.

1 Legislative changes — The words 'in the town' considers necessary in sub s (1) were substituted by Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923 for the words, 'in each presidency town at least twenty seven of those who are liable to serve on special juries and fifty four of those who are liable to serve on common juries'

2 "Shall be summoned" — The procedure for the service of summons to be followed is the one laid down in s 68 and the following sections and no other mode adopted for such service is justifiable. Thus the issue of summons by a registered letter is illegal and no fine can be imposed for non attendance in pursuance of such summons. Where the summons was served by affixing a duplicate on the door of the dwelling house of the juror but the latter had no knowledge thereof, as he was living away from his residence, it was held that he was not liable to fine for non attendance as the law did not contemplate the imposition of any obligation on persons on the jury list, either to notify their change of address or to make any arrangement for the acceptance of the summons.

a The words were substituted for the words 'presidency towns' by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act 18 [XXIII] of 1973

317.† (1) In addition to the persons so summoned as jurors, the said Court of Session shall if it thinks needful, after communication with the Commanding Officer, cause to be summoned such number of commissioned and non-commissioned officers in Her Majesty's Army or Air Force resident within ten miles of its place of sitting as the Court considers to be necessary to make up the juries required for the trial of persons charged with offences before the High Court as aforesaid

(2) All officers so summoned shall be liable to serve on such juries notwithstanding anything contained in this Code, but no such officer shall be summoned whom his Commanding Officer desires to have excused on the ground of urgent official duty, or for any other special official reason

1. Legislative changes — The words 'or Air Force' were inserted in sub s (1) and the word, 'official' at both the places in sub s (2) was substituted for the word 'military' by the Repealing and Amending Act 10 [X] of 197

a Substituted by A O for "Local Government."

1. Legislative changes. — The last twenty-three words beginning from "or, if the Local Government" were not found in the Code of 1882 but were newly added in the present Code.

2. "All male persons." — It is contrary to the usage of the country and eminently undesirable that a gentleman of high position, such as a hereditary Raja, should be placed on the list, or if placed on such list, should be summoned to serve as an assessor unless it were known that he would be willing to act as such¹

3. "Liable to serve." — The mere fact that a person's name is on the list does not render him liable to serve as an assessor unless he is liable under this section. Thus, a man may reside during the year in more than one district and his name might be entered in the jurors' or assessors' list in each of such districts. But he would be subject to serve as a juror or assessor only if he is residing in the district in which the trial is held. A juror or assessor, who is absent for a long time from his ordinary place of residence, will be regarded as non resident in that place and will be exempt from liability to serve as a juror or assessor under this section¹

4. Within the district. — Where the Sessions Judge of Kanara asked the High Court for special permission to hold his Court at Sirsi instead of at Karwar, the High Court declined to permit it as no assessors were available for the sessions at Sirsi which was outside the area fixed¹

1 Legislative changes

In the Code of 1898—

The words salaried in clause (b) police officers and in clause (d) and the whole clause (i) were not found in the Code of 189^o but have been added in this Code

Changes after 1898—

(1) A new clause (aa) was inserted after clause (a) by the Legislative Members Exemption Act 1925 (23 [XVIII] of 1925) It ran as follows

'(aa) Members of either chamber of the Indian Legislature and members of a Legislative Council constituted under the Government of India Act

The present clause (aa) was substituted for the above clause by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937

(2) In clause (g) the word Navy and the words or Air Force were inserted by the Amending Act 1931 (3, [XXV] of 1931) and the Repealing and Amending Act 1937 (10 [X] of 1937) respectively

(3) In clause (l) the words Provincial Government were substituted for the words Local Government by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937

2 Scope of the section —Under this section cases of exemption are dealt with while s 278 deals with cases of disqualification. Thus the Code makes a clear distinction between exemption and disqualification. The persons enumerated in this section though they are capable are not liable to serve as jurors or assessors (see s 371). This right to exemption has however to be claimed and established (s 324). Where the proper number of Europeans and Americans cannot otherwise be obtained, even the exempted persons may, under the proviso to s 326 sub s (3), be summoned to try Europeans and Americans.

3 Persons exempted under Civil Procedure Code—Clause (k) —Sections 640 and 641 of the Civil Procedure Code of 189^o are now ss. 132 and 133 of the present Civil Procedure Code of 1908. Under the former section women who according to the customs and manners of the country, ought not to be compelled to appear in public are exempt from personal appearance in Court. Under the latter section the Provincial Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, exempt from personal appearance in Court any person whose rank entitles him to the privilege of exemption the names and residences of such persons being forwarded to the High Court.

*K—List of Jurors and Assessors for Court of Session, and

319. All male persons between the ages of twenty-one and sixty shall, except as next hereinafter mentioned, be liable to serve as jurors or assessors at any trial held within the district in which they reside, or, if the ^a[Provincial Government] on consideration of local circumstances, has fixed any smaller area in this behalf, within the area so fixed

1 Legislative changes. — The last twenty three words beginning from or of the Local Government were not found in the Code of 1892 but were newly added in the present Code

2 'All male persons' — It is contrary to the usage of the country and eminently undesirable that a gentleman of high position such as a hereditary Raja should be placed on the list or if placed on such list should be summoned to serve as an assessor unless it were known that he would be willing to act as such ¹

3 "Liable to serve" — The mere fact that a person's name is on the list does not render him liable to serve as an assessor unless he is liable under this section. Thus a man may reside during the year in more than one district and his name might be entered in the jurors or assessors list in each of such districts. But he would be subject to serve as a juror or assessor only if he is residing in the district in which the trial is held. A juror or assessor who is absent for a long time from his ordinary place of residence will be regarded as non resident in that place and will be exempt from liability to serve as a juror or assessor under this section ¹

4 Within the district — Where the Sessions Judge of Kanara asked the High Court for special permission to hold his Court at Sirsi instead of at Harwar the High Court declined to permit it as no assessors were available for the sessions at Sirsi which was outside the area fixed ¹

320.¹ The following persons are exempt from liability to serve as

Exemptions jurors or assessors, namely

- (a) officers in civil employ superior in rank to a District Magistrate,
- (aa) members of any Legislature in British India,
- (b) salaried Judges,
- (c) Commissioners and Collectors of Revenue or Customs,

1 Legislative changes

In the Code of 1858—

The words salaried in clause (b) police officers and in clause (d) and the whole clause (i) were not found in the Code of 1852 but have been added in this Code

Changes after 1858—

- (1) A new clause (aa) was inserted after clause (a) by the Legislative Members Exemption Act 1925 (23 [XXIII] of 1925) It ran as follows

(aa) Members of either chamber of the Indian Legislature and members of a Legislative Council constituted under the Government of India Act

The present clause (aa) was substituted for the above clause by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937

- (2) In clause (g) the word Navy and the words or Air Force were inserted by the Amending Act 1931 (35 [XXXV] of 1931) and the Repealing and Amending Act 1927 (10 [V] of 1927) respectively

- (3) In clause (l) the words Provincial Government were substituted for the words Local Government by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937

2 Scope of the section—Under this section cases of exemption are dealt with while s 278 deals with cases of disqualification. Thus the Code makes a clear distinction between exemption and disqualification. The persons enumerated in this section though they are capable are not liable to serve as jurors or assessors (see s 321). This right to exemption has however to be claimed and established (s 323). Where the proper number of Europeans and Americans cannot otherwise be obtained even the exempted persons may, under the proviso to s 320 sub s (3), be summoned to try Europeans and Americans.

3 Persons exempted under Civil Procedure Code—Clause (k) —

Sections 640 and 641 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1852 are now ss 132 and 133 of the present Civil Procedure Code of 1908. Under the former section women who according to the customs and manners of the country, ought not to be compelled to appear in public are exempt from personal appearance in Court. Under the latter section the Provincial Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette exempt from personal appearance in Court any person whose rank entitles him to the privilege of exemption: the names and residences of such persons being forwarded to the High Court.

1. Legislative changes.

There was no material difference between the corresponding sections of the Codes of 1861 and 1872

Difference between the Codes of 1872 and 1882 —

The words "the Sessions Judge" and "for any such trial" were substituted respectively for the words 'the Court' and "for any case about to be tried at such sessions," which occurred in the corresponding section of the Code of 1872

Changes introduced in the Code of 1898 —

The words "seven days" were substituted for "three days" and the words "or the said special list" were added after the words "revised list"

Changes made in 1923 —

The words "and including. for the trial" at the end of sub-s (1) were inserted and sub ss (3) and (4) were added by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 12 [XII] of 1923

2. Scope and object of the section. — This section fixes the minimum number of jurors and assessors to be summoned by the Sessions Judge for trials in a session. The normal procedure contemplated is that all jurors or assessors should be summoned for the first day on which a criminal session commences, whatever may be the number of trials it may be proposed to hold in the course of that session¹

The total number of jurors or assessors so summoned are intended to be available for all the trials, though, in order to fix a minimum, it has been provided that the Judge is to summon at least double the number of jurors or assessors required for any particular trial to be held in the course of the session²

The object of the section in summoning a number of jurors or assessors is two fold. firstly, to ensure that there is no reason for suspicion that any of the jurors or assessors sitting on a particular trial has been planted on the Court by any person interested in the success or failure of the prosecution³ and secondly to leave a margin for those cases where any particular juror or jurors may claim exemption from being empanelled on the ground of ill health or some other reason⁴

The section is not however *mandatory*⁶. Although the section deals with the summoning of jurors for a particular session and has really no concern with individual cases at all⁶ the use of the word ordinarily shows that it is neither illegal nor irregular to summon jurors or assessors only for a particular trial and not for the whole of the session or to summon less than eighteen persons for a murder trial so long as the Judge takes care to have summoned a sufficient number of persons to enable him to choose the requisite number of jurors or assessors from among them in the manner provided by law⁷. In *Emperor v. Ermanali*⁸ fourteen persons were summoned to act as jurors in a murder case nine of them appeared and were chosen by lot. It was held that the trial was not bad. It is no part of the intention of the Legislature said Rankin C J. to have a large area of selection in the persons attending upon summons on the theory that the larger the number of effective names in the ballot the greater the chance that the persons chosen will make good jurors.

Where however in a murder trial less than eighteen persons are summoned and less than nine are chosen out of them it cannot be said that it was impracticable to get the requisite number, namely nine, and consequently the jury is not a validly constituted one. See Note 4 on S 274.

The section does not require that a fresh summons should be issued in the case of the failure to effect service on any of the jurors originally summoned. Thus where eighteen jurors were summoned out of whom eleven appeared and a jury of seven persons only was empanelled it was held that the failure to effect service on some of the jurors against whom summonses had been issued did not amount to a defect in procedure sufficient to vitiate the trial⁹.

3. Letter to be sent only by the Sessions Judge — The duty of issuing a letter or precept imposed on the Sessions Judge by this section cannot legally be performed by a subordinate Judge in temporary charge of the current duties of the Court of Session¹. In the undermentioned case² Rowland J. of the Patna High Court was however inclined to the view that the power of sending a precept could be exercised by an Assistant Sessions Judge.

4. Assessor not summoned if can be chosen by the Sessions Judge to make up deficiency — In the case of deficiency of jurors summoned or where practise it is not usual for the Sessions Judge acting under S 326 to summon a single set of jurors to hear all the cases that are set down for hearing in a particular session but rather to summon one set of jurors for each trial that has to be held and this procedure is in accordance with S 327.]

a juror is objected to and the objection is allowed, the deficiency can be made up by choosing from persons present in Court (see S 276, second proviso and S 279). There is no such provision applicable to the case of assessors. The Sessions Judge has, therefore, no power to select any one to act as an assessor who has not been summoned under this section¹. Thus, where the Sessions Judge had requested the District Magistrate to summon five persons to attend as assessors but only one of these persons was present, whereupon the Nazir of the Court was directed by the Judge to act as an assessor, it was held that as the Nazir was neither a person on the list of assessors nor summoned to act as an assessor, the trial was illegal². But, where out of the assessors summoned only three were present at the date of the trial and the Sessions Judge caused a summons to be served on a gentleman who was present in the Court and whose name was in the list of persons qualified to serve as assessors and chose him as an assessor, it was held that the trial was not illegal³.

5. Names of persons to be drawn by lot. — An accused person has a right to claim to be tried, whether by a jury or with the aid of assessors, chosen with strict regard to all the safeguards provided in the Code to secure perfect impartiality,¹ the object in view being to secure an impartial trial by rendering impossible any intentional selection of jurors or assessors to try a particular case². Thus, in the interests alike of the jury or the assessors and the prisoner, it is desirable that the persons, who are in fact to serve as jurors or assessors, should not be selected by the conscious choice of any one whether it be the District Magistrate, the Judge or any other person³.

327.⁶ The Court of Session may direct jurors or assessors to be Powers to summon summoned at other periods than the period specified in another set of jurors section 326, when the number of trials before the Court or assessors. renders the attendance of one set of jurors or assessors for a whole session oppressive or whenever for other reasons such direction is found to be necessary.

1 Scope of the section — Section 326 provides for the summoning of jurors or assessors for the first day on which the criminal session commences, while this section provides for summoning them at subsequent periods. Thus, if a set of jurors have been summoned by the Sessions Judge for the whole session, it is still open to him or to the presiding officer of any of the Courts holding sessions to summon another set of jurors for a particular trial if it is not convenient or practicable for the trial to be held by the jurors of the set summoned by the Sessions Judge under section 326¹

The powers under this section can be exercised by an Assistant Sessions Judge. Thus, where a case is adjourned to the next month after the jurors have been summoned, he can summon under this section a fresh set of jurors if he thinks fit to do so, but such a course is not imperative though desirable so that it might not be open to any person to suggest that there was a possibility of imputing any such thing as packing of the jury or of outside influences being brought to bear on them. The trial cannot be challenged as illegal on the ground that he did not summon fresh jurors for the adjourned date²

(3) For good cause shown, the Court may remit or reduce any fine so imposed

(4) In default of recovery of the fine by attachment and sale, such juror or assessor may, by order of the Court of Session, be imprisoned in the civil jail for the term of fifteen days, unless such fine is paid before the end of the said term

2 Failure to attend—Effect of — See Note 2 on S 319

If an assessor has been absent for a long time from district A and has gone to reside in district B so that he may be said to have almost ceased to be a resident of district A he is not liable to serve as an assessor in that district under S 319. Consequently he cannot be fined under this section for non attendance as an assessor in obedience to a summons served in district A of which he had no notice¹

3 "Shall be liable to a fine" — The order of a Sessions Judge fining an assessor is not open to appeal¹

4 "For good cause shown" — The fact that an assessor was ill on the day on which he was summoned to act as such and that he had produced a medical certificate to that effect would be a good cause under this section¹

1 Scope of the section—The power given to the Advocate General under this section is the power of entering a nolle prosequi, which is an entry on the record of a statement that the prosecutor will proceed no further in his action. The power does not depend on the consent of the Court which a Public Prosecutor has to obtain when acting under s 494. Entering a nolle prosequi is one of the rights and privileges which an Advocate General has by virtue of his appointment.¹

2 The Advocate-General may not further prosecute—A nolle prosequi is entered where any improper and vexatious attempts are made to oppress the defendant, as by repeatedly preferring defective indictments for the same supposed offence, or where it is clear that an indictment is not sustainable against the defendant¹ or questions of difficulty arise as to the jurisdiction of the Court.² Thus where, after a trial had commenced before it and a jury retired under s 556 of the Code and was succeeded by 8, and it was objected that 8 and the jury had no jurisdiction the Advocate General was allowed to enter a nolle prosequi.³ Similarly, where the jury gave a verdict in a case, before the case for the defence was heard the Advocate General entered a nolle prosequi and the accused was discharged.⁴

3. An order of discharge is no bar to fresh proceedings—An order of discharge under this section is no bar to fresh proceedings being taken before a competent Magistrate upon complaint, or upon a police report, or under s 150 (1) (c).¹ The same proceeding, however, in which nolle prosequi was entered cannot be renewed. Thus, where A and B were indicted before the Court B being at that time an absconder, and A was discharged under this section on the Advocate General entering nolle prosequi against him, and subsequently when B was apprehended, the same proceeding was sought to be continued against both A and B it was held that this could not be done.²

2. Scope and object of the section. — This section empowers a Magistrate to tender pardon to a person who is supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, an offence under investigation or inquiry, on condition that he makes a full and true disclosure of all the circumstances within his knowledge in relation to the accused and to the offence. The object of tendering such conditional pardon to an accomplice in the crime is to secure the evidence of such a person, and also to encourage him to give the fullest details in respect of the matter, so that points may be found in his evidence which may be capable of corroboration, especially in cases where it is otherwise impossible to establish the guilt of the accused from other evidence¹ In the exercise therefore, of the power to tender a pardon, the Magistrate should exercise a sound judicial

 pardon is to enable the Crown to obtain evidence which is otherwise shut out and thus to enable it to discretion,² and proceed with great caution and on ample grounds, and with a clear recognition of the risk which it necessarily involves of allowing an offender to escape just punishment at the expense of possibly innocent men³ Where a Magistrate tendered a pardon to a person who was the principal offender in order to obtain evidence against the other accused it was held that the Magistrate had wrongly exercised the discretion given by this section⁴

The provisions of this section do not imply that the only method of obtaining the evidence of an accused person against his co accused is by tendering a pardon to such person with all the conditions and safeguards mentioned in the section⁵ It is the right of the Crown at any stage to enter nolle prosequi (ss 333 and 401) and thereafter call such person as a witness for the Crown⁶ (See Note 16 and S 342) Similarly, there is nothing in the section to compel the police to produce an accused person who is intended to be examined as a witness in the case for the tender of a pardon. The police can refrain from prosecuting such person although there is adequate evidence to justify his prosecution and if they do so, he will be a competent witness in the trial of the other accused. But such a course is to be highly deprecated and the evidence of such a witness will be entitled to little weight⁷

As special powers are conferred upon the Magistrate by the section, he should exercise such powers in strict accordance with the provisions of the section.⁸

Where action has been taken under this section and a conditional pardon has been tendered and accepted, it is not thereafter open to the prosecution to ignore the provisions of this section and proceed under S 494. Thus, in such a case, the prosecution against the person who has accepted the pardon cannot be withdrawn under S 494 and the provisions of sub s (2A) of this section which require the case to be tried by a High Court or Sessions Court avoided. In determining whether action has been taken under this section, if the manner in which the tender of pardon is made follows in substance the method prescribed in this section, the section must be held to apply and minor and immaterial irregularities or variations cannot be taken to affect the operation of the section⁹ (See also Note 18)

When the prosecution wants to examine an accused person as a witness in cases of offences specified in the section the proper procedure is to proceed under this section and not under S 491. See Notes on S 491.

not be holding such inquiry or trial¹ A Magistrate of the first class not being a District Magistrate can tender a pardon only —

(a) in case the offence is under investigation if he has jurisdiction in the place where the offence might be inquired into and tried, and the sanction of the District Magistrate has been obtained therefor, or

(b) in case the offence is under inquiry or trial if the case is pending inquiry or trial before him

The words 'District Magistrate' in this section will include an Additional District Magistrate on whom all the powers of a District Magistrate have been conferred under section 10 (2)²

The mere absence of a written sanction of the District Magistrate where it appears that in fact an oral sanction was given, is only an irregularity which, under S 529 is not sufficient to vitiate the proceedings if it was obtained in good faith³

The tender of pardon being a judicial function⁴ the Magistrate empowered to exercise such function cannot delegate it to a police officer or to a subordinate Magistrate.⁵ Where a Magistrate, not empowered by law to tender a pardon, erroneously, in good faith tenders such pardon under this section the proceedings cannot be set aside merely on the ground of his not being so empowered [S 529, clause (g)] But if a Magistrate who has no jurisdiction in respect of such offence tenders a pardon such pardon is illegal and the defect cannot be cured under S 529⁶ The person to whom such illegal pardon is tendered continues to be an accused person and can be tried and convicted along with the other accused⁷ He cannot be examined as a witness (section 312), and if he has been examined his evidence is inadmissible⁸

A special Magistrate appointed under S 24 of the Bengal Suppression of Terrorist Outrages Act (12 [XII] of 1932) has power to tender a pardon under this section⁹

4 Power of Provincial Government to tender conditional pardon —

There is no provision in the Code conferring upon the Provincial Government a power to tender, to an accused person, a conditional pardon. Such pardon can be tendered only by the Magistrate and the Courts specified in ss 337 and 338¹ But the fact that the Magistrate in tendering the pardon did so after consulting the Provincial Government and with its authority is an internal matter of administration which cannot affect the position of the

As to the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of mercy see Section 401.

5 Offences in respect of which pardon may be tendered — The jurisdiction to tender a pardon to an accomplice is strictly limited to such offences as are specifically mentioned in the section itself.¹ It is determined with reference to the offence in respect of which the investigation is being made or the inquiry or trial is held and is not affected in any manner by a subsequent alteration of the charge or offence or by the ultimate result of the investigation inquiry or trial² or by the fact that there are also other offences alleged or charged against the accused.³ All that is necessary is that there should be an investigation or inquiry in progress relating to an offence referred to in the section.⁴ The words triable exclusively by the High Court or a Court of Session mean 'shown in the second schedule as so triable'.⁵ Before the amendment of 1933 conditional pardon could be granted only in cases of offences triable by a Court of Session or High Court.⁶ The amended section provides specifically for tender of pardon in respect of several other offences enumerated in the section.⁷

6 Effect of tendering pardon in other cases. — Where a pardon is granted in respect of an offence not specified in the section and the person to whom pardon is granted is examined as a witness such evidence is inadmissible. The reason is that as the pardon is unauthorized, the person continues to be an accused person and no oath can be administered to him¹ See Section 342. Nor can such person be prosecuted for giving false evidence²

7. Stage at which pardon can be tendered. — Before the amendment of 1923, the Magistrate could tender a pardon only in respect of the "offence under inquiry" and there was a conflict of decisions as to whether the word "inquiry" included also the stage of the investigation by the police¹ The amended section has definitely set the conflict at rest by specifically providing that the pardon may be granted even at the stage of the investigation by the police² The Magistrate has power to tender a pardon at any stage, i.e., until he commits the accused under sub-s. (2A) or discharges the accused.³ The mere fact that the case is adjourned on application under s. 526 does not deprive the Magistrate of his power of tendering a pardon.⁴

8 "Supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, the offence." — The expression "any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, the offence," is a wide one and is not necessarily confined to a person who has been charged with the offence or who has been sent up by the police for trial, as an accused person¹ It is not necessary that he should exactly know what crime is being committed in all its details² All that is requisite is that there should be the intention of assisting in the commission of the crime³ and that the Magistrate should be satisfied that he himself took part in the crime to the extent that he admits and that he is in a position to give a true account as to what occurred⁴

those who are in some way or other connected with the offence in question)

An accomplice is different from a spy. An accomplice is a person who concurs fully in the criminal designs of his co-conspirators for a time and joins in the execution of those designs while a spy or informer does not concur in those designs but enters into the conspiracy as agent for the prosecution for the sole purpose of detecting and disclosing it and of bringing the offenders to justice.⁶

The word supposed does not exclude a person who confesses the guilt and pleads guilty to the charge but is yet unconvicted. It merely excludes the person who has been already convicted of the offence.⁶

9 Condition of pardon — It has been already seen in Note 2 that the object of tendering a pardon is to encourage the approver to give the fullest details so that points may be found in his evidence which may be capable of corroboration. The law therefore requires not a cramped and constrained statement by the approver but a thorough and complete disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge bearing upon the offence or offences as to which he gives evidence.¹

It should however be borne in mind that the temptation to the accomplice to strain the truth should be as slight as possible and it is illegal to tender a pardon on condition that the prisoner should profess to have been present at the murder and to have personal knowledge of the circumstances under which the offence took place as alleged by the prosecution.² As to the effect of a breach of the conditions of pardon see Section 339.

10 Procedure in tendering pardon — The tender of pardon should be made by the Magistrate directly and should not be made through any police officer.¹ The Magistrate should at the time explain to the person to whom it is made all the conditions accompanying such tender of pardon and should also record his reasons for tendering the pardon (subs. (1A)). If the person does not accept the conditions the inquiry or trial will proceed as if no tender of pardon was made. If such person should accept the conditions it is the duty of the Magistrate to examine him as a witness under the rules applicable for the examination of witnesses.² As to whether the Magistrate should record informal statements from the person at the time of tendering the pardon see Note 13.

11. Recording reasons for tendering pardon — It has been seen already in Note 2 that the Magistrate should tender a pardon to an accomplice only on ample grounds and in exceptional cases and that he should exercise a sound judicial discretion before taking such a step. Sub section (1A) provides that it is his duty to record his reasons for so doing and that the accused is entitled to a copy thereof¹. Where however the circumstances which preceded the grant of pardon provide by themselves sufficient grounds for the Magistrate's action and such circumstances appear on record it is not necessary for the Magistrate to formally set out such circumstances in writing². Similarly where the Magistrate states in his order that in order to connect the accused with the offence of certain murder, it is essential to make an approver in the case, there is sufficient compliance with the provisions of subs (1A) of this section³. The recording of reasons is merely a matter relating to procedure and is not a condition precedent to the tender of pardon⁴. Thus an omission to record the reasons amounts only to an irregularity⁵ and will not vitiate the trial unless it is shown that it has in fact, occasioned a failure of justice⁶. See Section 537.

12 Accepting pardon. — A person can be said to accept a pardon tendered to him only when he actively assents to the conditions of the pardon and volunteers to make a statement with reference to the offence. Where he expresses complete ignorance and states that he is indifferent as to whether a pardon is granted or not he cannot be said to accept a tender of pardon¹. But it is not necessary that the acceptance of the pardon should be in writing or that it should be expressed in any other manner. It can be gathered from the circumstances. Thus the fact that he appears before the Magistrate in the capacity of a witness and not in the capacity of an accused person is a clear indication of the fact that he has accepted the pardon tendered to him².

13 Disclosure, whether should be recorded at the time of the tender of pardon. — The section does not contemplate the recording of any statement by the proposed approver before the pardon is granted to him¹.

There is a conflict of decisions as to whether after the pardon has been granted the approver can be examined on oath before the preliminary inquiry in the committing Magistrate's Court. One view is that such an examination is permissible under S 161² and the other view is that it is not.³ As there does not seem to be any reason why S 161 should not apply to such cases, it is submitted that the former view is correct.

14 Effect of pardon. — Where a pardon is tendered and accepted under this section, the accused person ceases to be such from the moment the pardon is accepted and is to be treated as a witness thereafter. It is not necessary that the prosecution should be withdrawn in such cases.¹

A pardon tendered under this section refers not only to the offence in respect of which it is tendered, but extends to all such offences also in connection with the same matter, as the approver has necessarily to disclose, in making a full and true disclosure of all the circumstances relating to such offence.² In *Queen Empress v Ganga Charan*³ Straight J, observed as follows:

"While, on the one hand, the condition is 'a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to such offence, on the other a non-compliance with it leaves him open to trial for the offence in respect of which the pardon was tendered, or any other offence in connection with the same matter. It must be borne in mind that, in countenancing these pardons to accomplices, the law does not invite a cramped and constrained statement by the approver, on the contrary it requires a thorough and complete disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge bearing upon the offence, or offences, as to which he gives evidence and when he has given his evidence, I do not think that the question of how far it is to protect him and what portion of it should not protect him, ought to be treated in a narrow spirit."

Where, however, the statement of the person to whom a pardon was tendered disclosed a distinct offence of dacoity which was committed one month prior to the offence in respect of which the pardon was tendered it was held that the tender of pardon did not extend to such an offence.⁴

A pardon once tendered and accepted cannot be withdrawn subsequently. It is not for the Magistrate who has tendered a pardon to decide whether the approver has or has not made a true statement. It is for the Public Prosecutor, after the trial is over, to give the necessary certificate under S 339 for the prosecution of the approver for breaking the conditions of pardon. The Magistrate has no power to withdraw the pardon.⁵

16 Examination of approver as witness. — Sub-section (2) — S 133 section (2) as it stood before the amendment of 1923, provided that the person accepting a tender of pardon should be examined as a witness "in the case," and it was held in the undermentioned cases¹ that the words "in the case" referred both to the magisterial inquiry and to the sessions trial and that, therefore, the approver ought to be examined in the sessions trial notwithstanding he did not fulfil the conditions of pardon in the magisterial inquiry. It was however, held in other cases that if the approver should show an inclination to resile from his evidence before the committing Magistrate the prosecution was not bound to examine him as a witness in the sessions trial as his examination before the committing Magistrate is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of subs (2).² The amended section now specifically provides that such person should be examined as a witness in the Magistrate's Court and in the subsequent trial, if any.³ There is still a conflict of decisions whether the section makes it obligatory on the prosecution to examine the approver in the Sessions Court where in the committing Magistrate's Court he has resiled from his former position and broken the condition of his pardon. The Lahore High Court⁴ and the Sind Judicial Commissioners Court⁵ have held that the approver must be examined in the Sessions Court even in such cases, while the opposite view has been expressed by the Calcutta High Court⁶.

17. Evidence of an accomplice — Credibility of. — In dealing with this question as to the weight to be attached to the evidence of an accomplice, it is necessary to consider the provisions of S 133 of the Evidence Act, as also illustration (b) to S 114 of that Act. Section 133 of that Act provides as follows:

"An accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person and a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice."

Illustration (b) to section 114 runs as follows: "The Court may presume that an accomplice is unworthy of credit unless he is corroborated in material particulars.¹ The reasons underlying the presumption are —

- (i) that an accomplice is likely to swear falsely in order to shift the blame on to others, general rule and it cannot be affirmed that in no circumstances can the evidence of a accomplice be used to corroborate that of another¹⁴ In this connexion, the following observations of a Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court¹⁵ may be quoted

"From a consideration of all the matters to be dealt with it is apparent First Provided it has been established by extraneous evidence or matters appearing on the record that the accomplices are not acting in collusion with one another, the cumulative effect of the evidence of two or more of them may be sufficient to remove the prima facie presumption of the individual unworthiness of credit of their statements and if this be the case, a conviction may legitimately be recorded upon their statements alone, if the Court is convinced of their truth The same observation applies to the cumulative effect of the evidence of an accomplice and the confession of a co-accused where the presumption of their unreliability has, in the special circumstances been rebutted Secondly That evidence from a source which is not prima facie unworthy of credit may prove a fact which displaces in a particular case the presumption that an accomplice is unworthy of credit Thirdly That corroboration must proceed from a source extraneous to the person whose testimony it is sought to corroborate But it may consist of extraneous proof of a fact relating to that very person's prior conduct"

It is not enough if the corroborative evidence is of a vague or general nature and relates merely to the circumstances of the occurrence or to the details of the crime¹⁶ It should refer and relate distinctly to the complicity of the accused in such offence and also to the identity of each of the accused¹⁷

It is not strictly necessary, however, that the corroboration should be afforded only by direct evidence—it may in certain cases be provided by circumstantial evidence.¹⁸ But the circumstantial evidence should be such as would unmistakably lead to the inference of guilt and be reasonably inconsistent with the theory about the innocence of the accused.¹⁹

It has been held that irregularities in matters of procedure in recording the statements of an approver cannot take away the value of his evidence when it is found that it is in the main supported by other reliable evidence.²⁰

As to the value to be attached to verification proceedings in connection with confessions and statements of approver see the undermentioned case.²¹

18 Commitment of accused Prior to s (4) to the section as it stood before 1922 the Magistrate (with the exception of the Presidency Magistrate) who had tendered a pardon to a person and had examined such person as a witness in the case was precluded from trying the case himself even though the offence which the accused appeared to have committed might be triable by such Magistrate.² It was however held that there was no bar to another Magistrate competent to try the case from doing so.³ Sub-section (4) has now been omitted and a new sub s (2A) has been added by the amendment of 1921. Under the latter sub-section where a pardon has been granted to a person and he has also been examined as a witness then the Magistrate if he believes that a prima facie case against the other accused is established should commit such accused to the Sessions Court or to the High Court as the case may be and has no power to try the case himself even if he is otherwise competent to do so.⁴ Nor can the case be tried by another Magistrate though he may be vested with power under S 30 to try such an offence⁴ Where, however, a Special Magistrate was empowered by Ordinance 2 (II) of 1912 to try a case, it was held that he was not bound to commit the accused under sub s (2A) for the reason that where the provisions of the Ordinance and those of the Code conflict the provisions of the Ordinance are to prevail⁵ A similar view has been taken in the undermentioned case⁶ arising under Ordinance 2 (II) of 1912 Similarly, a Special Magistrate appointed under the Bengal Suppression of Terrorist Outrages Act, 1932, must after tender of pardon, try the accused himself instead of committing him for trial to the Court of Session or the High Court⁷

The fact that the Magistrate in tendering the pardon did so after consulting the Provincial Government and with its authority will not affect the position of the accused or the approver, and once pardon has been tendered, the trial must not be by another Magistrate, even though he is vested under S 20 to try such an offence, but by the High Court or the Sessions Court⁸

The right to trial by a Sessions Court or High Court conferred by sub s (2A) comes into existence when the conditions mentioned in the sub section are fulfilled It is not dependent upon the nature of evidence given by the person who has accepted the pardon. Thus, if a person who has accepted a pardon disclaims any connection with or knowledge of the offence in his evidence, the tender of pardon does not cease to be effectual so far as the accused is concerned and the right of the accused to be tried by Sessions Court or High Court is not affected⁹

The sub section does not authorise the joint commitment of the approver along with the other accused¹⁰ For cases in which approver can be tried and the procedure in such cases, see Ss 339 and 339A

There is no jurisdiction to order the detention of the approver till the expiration of the period of limitation for filing an appeal from the decision in the case His detention can only be ordered till the termination of the trial⁴

338.* At any time after commitment, but before judgment is passed, the Court to which the commitment is made may, with the view of obtaining on the trial the evidence of any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, any such offence, tender, or order the committing Magistrate or the District Magistrate to tender, a pardon on the same condition to such person

1 Scope of the section. — Section 337 provides for tender of pardon to an accomplice during the stage of investigation or of inquiry into the offence by a Magistrate This section enables the Sessions Judge to tender, or direct the Magistrate or District Magistrate to tender a pardon after the commitment of the case¹ He has power to tender a pardon or to direct the tender of pardon at any time before judgment is pronounced² but he should not exercise such power after the evidence for the prosecution and of the defence has been taken and the opinion of the assessors has also been given³ Where the tender of pardon made by the Magistrate is found to be invalid the Sessions Judge may make a valid tender of pardon under this section⁴

An Assistant Sessions Judge when presiding over a Court of Sessions is the Court to which commitment is made and therefore has power under this section to tender pardon⁵

In sub s (2) the word 'forfeited' has been substituted for the word 'withdrawn' See Note 4

Changes introduced by Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923 —

- (1) In sub s (1), the words 'and the Public Prosecutor certifies that in his opinion were inserted See Note 2
- (2) The proviso to sub s (1) was added See Note 7.
- (3) The words 'such person may be' after the words 'was made' in sub s (1) were substituted for the words 'he may be'
- (4) The words 'at such trial at the end of sub s (2) were substituted for the words 'when the pardon has been forfeited under this section'

2 The certificate of the Public Prosecutor —

Prior to the amendment of 1923 if the approver did not comply with the conditions of pardon the Court before which his evidence was given, could only record its opinion to the effect that he had not complied with the conditions of the pardon and leave it to the District Magistrate to prosecute him if he thought fit to do so it could not itself *direct a prosecution*¹ It was however held in the undermentioned cases² that a Sessions Judge before whom the evidence of the approver was given could himself order the approver to be committed to trial, if he found that he did not comply with the conditions of the pardon See also the undermentioned cases³ decided before the amendment of 1923 These cases are no longer of any importance in view of the amendment of 1923 making the certificate of the Public Prosecutor the sole basis for the prosecution of the approver for the original offence⁴ The Sessions Judge has, thus, no power to order the prosecution of the approver *suo motu*⁵ Where, however proceedings had already been instituted against the approver under this section before the date on which the amendment took effect, it was held that the certificate of the Public Prosecutor was not necessary⁶

The certificate, which is required as a condition precedent to the trial of an approver, has to be filed before his trial commences in the Court of Session It is not absolutely essential to file it in the committing Court and even if it is so, the absence of it is not fatal and the commitment can, in view of S 532, be accepted by the Court of Session⁷

This section does not require that the particulars in regard to which the pardon is alleged to have been forfeited should be given in the certificate, and a certificate cannot be said to be defective if it does not mention such particulars⁸

It has been held that the person who is authorized to grant a certificate under this section is the Public Prosecutor who conducted the case in which the pardon was granted and that he need not necessarily occupy the position of Public Prosecutor on the date on which he grants the certificate⁹ But where a case was conducted by an Assistant Public Prosecutor in the Sessions Court and he expressed his intention not to take action against the approver, but subsequently the Public Prosecutor issued a certificate under this section, it was held that the certificate was not without jurisdiction¹⁰

3. "Any person who has accepted such tender." — In a proceeding against the approver under this section, it should first be proved that the approver accepted the conditions of the pardon,¹ that is, that the conditions were fully explained to him, that he was free to accept or refuse the conditions and that he accepted the tender of pardon on a full understanding of such conditions² It is also open to a person, who has accepted a pardon in the first instance, to resile from such acceptance and say that he may be tried in respect of the original offence in order that his character may be cleared. In such cases, the provisions of this section do not apply and he may be tried jointly with the other accused³ See also S 337

under s 337 or s 338, before the approver could be tried for the offence, in respect of which the pardon was tendered¹ Under the present Code however, no such order is necessary and the only question, which the Court has to consider before trying the approver for the original offence, is whether he has, by some act or omission on his part, failed to comply with the conditions of pardon² It is the duty of the prosecution to establish that the approver has failed to comply with the conditions of the pardon³ either —

(a) by wilfully concealing anything essential or

(b) by wilfully giving false evidence⁴

The mere fact that his alleged associates in crime against whom he had given evidence have been acquitted⁵ or that the Sessions Judge or the Magistrate is of opinion that he was not telling the truth⁶ or that the facts stated by him are not probable⁷ or the mere fact that some discrepancies have been elicited from him in cross examination⁸ or that there are certain inconsistencies in his evidence on immaterial points,⁹ is not sufficient to show that the condition of the pardon has not been complied with Where however the approver wilfully introduces discrepancies into his deposition in order that the Court may hold that he is not a reliable witness, he forfeits his pardon¹⁰

The Lahore High Court has held that it is not strictly necessary that the prosecution should have actually examined the approver as a witness, both before the Magistrate's Court and the Sessions Court before proceedings are instituted against him for non compliance with the conditions of pardon and that it is enough, if he is shown to have made a statement absolutely inconsistent with the statement that he made at the time the pardon was tendered to him¹¹ But the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court has taken a different view¹² Where the evidence given by an approver in the sessions trial is not in compliance with the conditions of the pardon, the fact that he gave evidence in accordance with the conditions before the committing Magistrate does not save him from being proceeded against under this section¹³ But when the evidence given by the approver in the Sessions Court was in accordance with the conditions of his pardon and was evidence upon which, in the circumstances subsequently disclosed, reliance might have been placed, then the fact that in the committing Magistrate's Court the approver gave false evidence should not necessarily be taken to be non compliance with the conditions of pardon¹⁴

5. "Wilfully concealing anything essential." — The prosecution has to establish that certain essential facts were within the knowledge of the approver, and that he had wilfully concealed such facts¹ The mere fact that the approver absconded at the time does not amount to a wilful concealment of anything essential within the meaning of the section²

As has been seen in Note 9 on S 337, it is the duty of the approver to make a thorough and complete disclosure of all facts within his knowledge bearing upon the offence or offences in respect of which he is giving evidence. Thus, he is not bound, in fulfilment of the conditions of pardon, to make any disclosure relative to any offence, which was not being inquired into at the time³

6. Effect of pardon. — Where pardon is tendered to a person, on condition that he should make a true and full disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offence, it is a matter of utmost importance that the strictest faith should be kept with him¹ Thus, where a person is granted a pardon, and having been under the impression that he has freed himself from the consequences of his incriminating statements, he makes a disclosure of his complicity in offences, other than those in respect of which he was granted a pardon, it would be improper to institute proceedings against him in respect of such other offences² See also Section 337, Note 14

7 Procedure at the trial — Joint trial. — Prior to the amendment of 1973, there was a conflict of opinions as to whether an approver, who had broken the conditions of pardon, could be tried for the offence for which he was tendered a pardon along with the other accused, or whether his trial ought to be in a separate proceeding altogether. It was held in one set of cases that there was no provision in the Code prohibiting a joint trial, and if an approver had been committed in time, it was not illegal to try him jointly with the other accused for the original offence¹ It was, however, held in another set of cases that the trial of the approver on the original charge ought to be in a separate proceeding altogether which should commence de novo after the case in which he had given evidence had been fully heard and determined² and that he should not be put into the dock after his evidence is given to be tried jointly along with the other accused³ The proviso to sub s (1) has been introduced by the amendment of 1923 which specifically provides that the approver shall not be tried jointly with the other accused⁴

Until the termination of the trial in which the approver has given evidence he has to be in judicial custody unless he had already been admitted to bail (see sub s (3) to S 337) At the termination of the trial however he should be discharged by the Court which tries the case But the Crown may re-arrest him and proceed against him for the offence in respect of which he was granted a conditional pardon if so advised⁵ that is as has been seen in Note 2 already if the Public Prosecutor certifies that the approver had failed to comply with the conditions of the pardon In such proceedings the approver is entitled to plead the tender of pardon and the compliance of the conditions thereof in bar of the trial

8 Plea of pardon in bar — See Section 339A

9 Use of statements made by the approver — Sub section (2) — Sub section (2) provides that any statement made by a person who has accepted a tender of pardon may be used in evidence against him in case he is proceeded against under this section on account of his non compliance with the conditions of the pardon. Thus the admissibility of such a statement is not affected by S 24 of the Evidence Act¹. But it has been held in the undermentioned decisions² that S 339 (2) operates as an exception to S 24 of the Evidence Act only in respect of statements which have been induced by a promise of pardon and that statements obtained by threats or violence are still within the reach of S 24 of the Evidence Act. Before a statement of the approver is used in the trial against him it is necessary that it should be properly proved that it should be put to him and that he should be asked if he desires to offer any explanations thereon³.

Sub section (2) applies not only to statements by the approver in the committing Magistrate's Court or in the Sessions Court but also to statements made by him before the inquiry in the committing Magistrate's Court⁴ provided they were made after the offer and acceptance of pardon by the approver⁵.

10 Prosecution for perjury—Sanction of the High Court.—Under sub s (3) it is essential that the prosecution should obtain the sanction of the High Court before proceeding against the approver for giving false evidence and if such sanction is not obtained before the institution of the proceedings the defect affects the jurisdiction of the Court and cannot be cured under s 53¹ The application for sanction to prosecute the approver should be made on behalf of the Crown by a regular application to the High Court and a letter of reference by the Sessions Judge is not sufficient²

The High Court is not bound to accord sanction in every case that is brought to its notice under sub s (3) of this section³ but has a discretion in the matter. The discretion vested in the High Court to sanction the prosecution of the approver for perjury should be exercised with extreme caution⁴. The necessity for obtaining the previous sanction of the High Court shows that the mere fact that the approver makes two inconsistent statements cannot be a justification for directing his prosecution⁵. The High Court before granting a sanction, should carefully consider all the circumstances in the case and decide the cardinal question, whether the previous statement or confession was true and voluntary⁶. If it is of opinion that such previous statement is true on the facts before it, then his subsequent statement ought to be false, and in such cases it is not only desirable but also expedient to sanction the prosecution⁷. If, however, the first statement or confession is not true but that his later statement is the true one, then the inference may be drawn that the first statement or confession was obtained by threat or inducement and in such cases it would be undesirable to sanction the prosecution⁸. The High Court has also a discretion in cases where the approver is induced to make certain statements in connexion with a capital charge to allow him every possible locus penitentiae in respect of such a statement⁹. Where the approver is proceeded against for the original offence itself in respect of which he was tendered a pardon it is not proper to sanction his prosecution for perjury¹⁰. Such sanction should be granted only in case it appears to the High Court that a conviction for the original offence is unlikely for any reason or that even on a conviction on the original charge the sentence that could be passed would be too light in the circumstances of the case¹¹.

Sub section (3) merely imposes an additional condition to the institution of a prosecution for perjury and does not have the effect of overriding the provisions of s. 46. Thus even where the sanction of the High Court is obtained the prosecution could be instituted only in accordance with the provisions of ss 195 and 476¹². The High Court may

(2) If the accused does so plead, the Court shall record the plea and proceed with the trial, and the jury, or the Court with the aid of the assessors, or the Magistrate, as the case may be, shall, before judgment is passed in the case find whether or not the accused has complied with the conditions of the pardon, and, if it is found that he has so complied, the Court shall, notwithstanding anything contained in this Code, pass judgment of acquittal

2 Plea of pardon. — The procedure laid down under this section should be strictly followed ¹ It is the duty of the Court to explain the provisions of this section clearly to the accused and to tell him that he is entitled to plead that he has complied with the conditions of the pardon ² The mere fact that the accused raised such a plea before the committing Magistrate and that the Magistrate had given his finding on such a plea does not absolve the Sessions Judge from the duty cast upon him under this section of asking the accused, if he pleads compliance with the conditions of the pardon ³

3 Procedure under this section — Before the introduction of this section in 1923 it was held that where the approver raised a plea that he had complied with the conditions of the pardon it was the duty of the Court to decide and give a finding on that issue first before trying him for the offence in respect of which the pardon was tendered ⁴ Such a course necessarily led to complications inasmuch as in deciding the preliminary

1. Scope —The old section which read 'every person accused before any Criminal Court may of right be defended by a pleader' gave rise to speculation as to the scope of the word 'accused'. Some decisions favoured a wide interpretation of the word so as to cover any person over whom a Magistrate or other Court exercises jurisdiction¹. Consonant to this interpretation the section was held to apply to persons against whom proceedings were instituted under Chapter VIII² and Chapter XI³. Other decisions however regarded the above definition as too wide and confined the word 'accused' to those persons who were accused of an offence⁴. In conformity with this view the section was held inapplicable to persons concerned in proceedings under Division C of chapter VIII⁵. It was also doubted whether pleaders could appear in proceedings under S 62 of the Code of 1861 corresponding when witnesses are examined in chief, not only to check leading questions but to prevent irrelevant evidence being recorded.⁷

A Magistrate exercises jurisdiction with material irregularity when he holds a trial at a place where the accused are totally incapable of making a proper defence and are deprived of the opportunity of being represented by a pleader⁸ Where a Magistrate held Court on a Sunday, it was held that, though holding Court on a Sunday was in itself not an illegality, yet the effect having been to prejudice the accused and deprive him of the right given to him under S 340, the conviction should be set aside⁹ A conviction was however, allowed to stand, where though the action of a Magistrate in accelerating a case had resulted in depriving the accused of the services of his senior counsel, the accused had, nevertheless, not been prejudiced thereby¹⁰

An appellant is entitled to be heard through his pleader.¹¹ A Judge contravenes the provisions of the Code in deciding an appeal without hearing counsel on such a date as to make it physically impossible for counsel to attend when the Judge had before him a petition from the accused's counsel praying to be heard.¹²

When a person is not defended, the Magistrate or Judge ought, in the interests of justice, to test the accuracy of statements of witnesses by questions in the nature of cross-examination,¹³ and in the cases of ignorant individuals accused of technical offences, to assist them in putting up obvious defensive pleas.¹⁴

Similarly, in cases where the prisoner being too poor to defend himself, a lawyer has been engaged to defend him at the expense of the Crown, the trial Judge must use his greater experience to cross examine the witnesses when he sees that the defence lawyer is incompetent. He should not however, do this unnecessarily but only when it is desirable in the interest of justice.¹⁵

5. Right of accused while in custody.—The section not only contemplates that the accused should be defended by a pleader at the time proceedings are actually going on, but also implies that he shall have a reasonable opportunity, if in custody, of getting into communication with his pleader and preparing for his defence¹ So, when accused is

A Judge cannot, however, be said to act contrary to S 340, by interfering in a dispute between a counsel assigned for the defence and another counsel who is asked to associate himself with the former and in deciding that the defence should be conducted by the former⁶.

6a. Appointment of defence counsel by the Crown. — There is no law providing for the employment of counsel at the expense of the Government in an enquiry before a Magistrate, but on principle there is no objection to such employment if the Crown is prepared to pay for the services of a pleader. But when the Sessions Judge or the Magistrate engages a counsel for the defence of an accused, he does so with the express or implied consent of the latter and the Court has no authority to force upon him the services of a counsel if he is unwilling to accept them¹. See also Note 6.

In selecting lawyers to defend prisoners who are too poor to instruct counsel on their own account, those whose duty it is to select lawyers to defend at the expense of the Crown, should not treat the selection as a matter of patronage for the benefit of the lawyers so appointed. The selection should be made from among young men of marked ability².

See also Criminal Rules of Practice (Madras) 1931, Rr 117, 157, 158, 159 and 160 as to the appointment of advocates for the defence of accused who have no advocates of their own. See also the undermentioned case³.

7. Arguments — A Court is bound to hear arguments offered at any criminal trial or proceeding¹. It is not a question of indulgence but of right as it is an elementary principle of law that no order ought to be made to a man's prejudice without hearing him². Refusal to hear arguments is not a mere irregularity but an illegality³. But where the pleaders do not attend on the day fixed for hearing arguments, the Court can pronounce judgment without hearing them⁴ and a Magistrate may cut short an argument which has proceeded for an inordinate length of time⁵. However, a Magistrate cannot arbitrarily fix a brief period for the defence to complete its arguments, and if he refuses to extend that period and the defence thereupon does not advance any argument there is no proper trial of the case and consequently the conviction of the accused cannot be justified⁶. Where a court witness was examined after the close of both parties' case and

Where a counsel is entitled to be heard, he is entitled generally to be heard by an oral address and not by a *written speech*⁸ It is the duty of the presiding officer to take such notes of the arguments as he thinks fit when they are being submitted to the Court⁹ The practice of allowing counsel to file memoranda of arguments has been held to be improper, especially so when they are taken behind the back of one of the parties¹⁰ If in any case a pleader desires to submit to the Court the notes of his argument or of any further argument, which he thinks in the interest of his client ought to be put before the Court, he should submit them to the pleader for the opposite party, so that the latter may have an opportunity of making any remarks or any criticism in respect thereof¹¹ Not hearing counsel, but requiring him to file a written argument, is, however, not an illegality but an irregularity which may be waived.¹² Where a counsel on behalf of his client is entitled to be last heard in the matter, he cannot be deprived of the right¹³ but the violation of the right is only an irregularity which may be cured by s 537¹⁴ Writing of judgment during the arguments is irregular, but curable under Section 537¹⁵

8. Citing accused's counsel as witness. — It is very reprehensible for the prosecution to call as a witness, in the course of the proceeding, a counsel who is actually defending an accused person. It not only affects the proper conduct of the defence but gives a handle to the prosecution to prevent a counsel who is acquainted with the facts of the case from conducting the defence. If the prosecution wants to call the defence counsel as a witness, sufficient notice ought to be given to the accused to enable him to engage a competent counsel¹ Where the accused's counsel is cited as a witness, the rule as to exclusion of witnesses from the Court will not apply to him, for it would conflict with the provisions of Section 340²

It is desirable that counsel do not appear in cases where it is probable their evidence would be material³ No self respecting counsel would like to conduct a case for the defence after having been called as a witness for the prosecution⁴ The real objection is not to his giving evidence (because he is a competent witness) but to his continuing as a counsel in the case in which he knows he is likely to be examined as a witness⁵

9. Court and pleader. — A Magistrate should not conduct himself unpleasantly towards persons brought before him for trial or their legal advisers,¹ and it is highly improper for the Court or for persons in charge of the prosecution to intimidate either the accused or the pleaders appealing for them.²

A Magistrate has no right to ask a pleader to sit down in the middle of his cross-examination because he was asking irrelevant questions. He can only rule out the questions as irrelevant. He cannot refuse to allow the pleader to cross-examine witnesses or permit him to do so only on condition of his apologizing for his previous contumacious behaviour.³ It is improper to suspend a pleader before the close of a case, as grave injustice might be done to the clients by depriving them of his services.⁴

Advocates have ample discretion in the conduct of the case of which they are in charge and Courts cannot fetter their discretion by insisting that their case should be put to this witness or that.⁵ As a rule, the Court should leave witnesses to the pleaders to be dealt with.⁶

A pleader has a general authority to act in the interests of his client in the manner he thinks best, he cannot be charged with misconduct if he writes out petitions without asking the client and asks or advises him to present the same.⁷

As to the authority of a pleader or counsel to make admissions on behalf of his client in criminal cases, see the undermentioned decisions.⁸

While Judges should be careful not to offer discourtesy or insult to the professional gentlemen who appear before them, counsel should also recognize their responsibility and their duties towards the Court and to the public and should endeavour by their conduct to prevent any unpleasantness and to avoid provoking the Court to offer discourtesy.⁹

Some latitude should be allowed to a member of the bar, insisting in the conduct of his case upon his question being taken down or his objections being noted, where the Court thinks the question inadmissible or the objections untenable. There ought to be a spirit of give and take between the Bench and the Bar in such matters.¹⁰

It is improper for one and the same counsel to appear for two accused having conflicting defences.¹¹ A pleader who is himself interested in a case ought not to appear for the accused as he is prone to allow himself to be swayed by his own feelings and improperly obstruct the course of justice.¹²

It is not the duty of an advocate to approach the trial Judge and apprise him that in his opinion the man whose fate has been entrusted to his care has no defence to make. He

duty is to protect his client as far as possible from being convicted except by a competent tribunal and upon legal evidence sufficient to support a conviction for the offence of which he is charged¹³

10. "Pleader." — The word "pleader" means and includes a pleader, muktear, advocate, vakil and attorney of a High Court authorized by law to practise in any Court. see S 4 (1), cl (r) Rule 10 of the Appellate Side Rules of the Bombay High Court debars advocates who are not advocates on the original side from appearing, pleading or acting in any suit or in the High Court in any matter of ordinary original jurisdiction, civil or criminal. Hence, advocates on the appellate side do not come within the definition of pleader quoad the High Court Sessions¹

The question whether a vakil can act for a party in a criminal appeal from the original side of the High Court or whether the appearance can be only by an attorney depends upon the rules of that Court and is not concluded by anything in this Code². A Munsif's Court pleader comes within the category of "authorized pleader"³. But a person who is licensed to appear only in certain districts cannot be said to be authorized to practise in a Court beyond those limits. But it is in the discretion of the Magistrate to permit him to appear for an accused person. The discretion should, however, be exercised judiciously and sparingly⁴.

A Magistrate has no power to forbid a duly qualified pleader to appear⁵. No vakalat is necessary when an authorized pleader appears in defence of an accused person either at the original trial or in an appeal. A memorandum of appearance is sufficient⁶. Even this has been held to be unnecessary when the party also is present⁷.

District Judges have no power to forbid legal practitioners from practising pending renewal of their certificates. Any such orders must proceed from the High Court⁸.

11. Muktears and other persons. — Under the Code of 1861, an accused was entitled to be defended by a muktear¹ or authorised agent².

The law now relative to this right is contained in S 340 read with S 4 (1) (r) of the Code. Every person accused before a criminal Court may of right be defended by a pleader, and "pleader" (before the amendment of 1923) included muktears and other persons, only if they had the Court's permission to appear³. 9 Court and pleader.—A Magistrate should not conduct himself unpleasantly towards persons brought before him for trial or their legal advisers¹ and it is ~~very~~ improper for the Court or for persons in charge of the prosecution to intimidate the accused or the pleaders appearing for them.²

A Magistrate has no right to ask a pleader to sit down in the middle of his cross-examination because he was asking irrelevant questions. He can only rule out the questions as irrelevant. He cannot refuse to allow the pleader to cross-examine witnesses or permit him to do so only on condition of his apologizing for his previous contumacious behaviour. It is improper to suspend a pleader before the close of a case, as grave injustice might be done to the clients by depriving them of his services.⁴

Advocates have ample discretion in the conduct of the case of which they are in charge and Courts cannot fetter their discretion by insisting that their case should be put to this witness or that.⁵ As a rule, the Court should leave witnesses to the pleaders to be dealt with.⁶

A pleader has a general authority to act in the interests of his client in the manner he thinks best. He cannot be charged with misconduct if he writes out petitions without asking the client and asks or advises him to present the same.⁷

As to the authority of a pleader or counsel to make admissions on behalf of his client in criminal cases, see the undermentioned decisions.⁸

While Judges should be careful not to offer discourtesy or insult to the professional gentlemen who appear before them, counsel should also recognize their responsibility and their duties towards the Court and to the public and should endeavour by their conduct to prevent any unpleasantness, and to avoid provoking the Court to offer discourtesy.⁹

Some latitude should be allowed to a member of the bar, insisting in the conduct of his case upon his question being taken down or his objections being noted where the Court thinks the question inadmissible or the objections untenable. There ought to be a spirit of give and take between the Bench and the Bar in such matters.¹⁰

It is improper for one and the same counsel to appear for two accused having conflicting defences.¹¹ A pleader who is himself interested in a case ought not to appear for the accused as he is prone to allow himself to be swayed by his own feelings and improperly obstruct the course of justice.¹²

It is not the duty of an advocate to approach the trial Judge and apprise him that in his opinion the man whose fate has been entrusted to his care has no defence to make. His

duty is to protect his client as far as possible from being convicted except by a competent tribunal and upon legal evidence sufficient to support a conviction for the offence of which he is charged¹³

10. "Pleader." — The word "pleader" means and includes a pleader, muktear, advocate, vakil and attorney of a High Court authorized by law to practise in any Court see S 4 (1), cl (r) Rule 10 of the Appellate Side Rules of the Bombay High Court debars advocates who are not advocates on the original side from appearing, pleading or acting in any suit or in the High Court in any matter of ordinary original jurisdiction, civil or criminal. Hence, advocates on the appellate side do not come within the definition of pleader quoad the High Court Sessions¹

The question whether a vakil can act for a party in a criminal appeal from the original side of the High Court or whether the appearance can be only by an attorney depends upon the rules of that Court and is not concluded by anything in this Code² A Munsif's Court pleader comes within the category of "authorized pleader"³ But a person who is licensed to appear only in certain districts cannot be said to be authorized to practise in a Court beyond those limits. But it is in the discretion of the Magistrate to permit him to appear for an accused person. The discretion should, however, be exercised judicially and sparingly⁴

A Magistrate has no power to forbid a duly qualified pleader to appear⁵ No vakalat is necessary when an authorized pleader appears in defence of an accused person either at the original trial or in an appeal. A memorandum of appearance is sufficient⁶ Even this has been held to be unnecessary when the party also is present⁷

District Judges have no power to forbid legal practitioners from practising pending renewal of their certificates. Any such orders must proceed from the High Court⁸

11. Muktears and other persons. — Under the Code of 1861, an accused was entitled to be defended by a muktear¹ or authorised agent²

The law now relative to this right is contained in S 340 read with S 4 (1) (r) of the Code. Every person accused before a criminal Court may of right be defended by a pleader, and "pleader" (before the amendment of 1923) included muktears and other persons, only if they had the Court's permission to appear³ The amendment of 1923 has done away with the necessity for permission so far as muktears are concerned. As regards other persons, the provision regarding permission still holds good. An estate manager may be a pleader provided he has the permission of the Court to plead.⁴ A Prosecuting Inspector may, with the Court's permission, defend an accused person.⁵ In the undermentioned case,⁶ third class advocates in Burma would appear to have required permission to plead and act in a Sessions Court. See also Notes on S 4 (1) (r).

Though prior to the amendment muktears required the Court's permission to constitute them pleaders in a particular case, it was held that it would rarely be a wise discretion on the part of the Court to refuse permission to a muktear to appear for the defence as it would be depriving parties of legal aid which they can frequently obtain at a moderate cost.⁷

The practice of permitting private vakils to defend parties is not illegal as it is left to the discretion of the Magistrate to hear such agents or not.⁸

The discretion must be exercised in respect of each case individually and a general order prohibiting a person from appearing in any case in any Court or Courts is illegal.⁹ If a person is aggrieved by the refusal of a Magistrate to allow him to appear in a particular case he may move the High Court in revision.¹⁰ But when the case is ended, it would be useless to proceed with a revision petition in respect of the order refusing permission, the accused may, however, take it as a ground of appeal that he has been deprived of legal assistance.¹¹

12 Sub-section (2) — It was assumed in the undermentioned case¹ that the class of persons specified in this sub section referred to accused persons and it was held that the Legislature removed, in the case of this particular class of persons, a disability which ordinarily attached to accused persons. According to another view, the new sub-section does not remove the restraint from any class of accused persons but only makes it clear that the persons mentioned therein are not really accused persons to whom the restriction against being put on oath would apply.²

Even prior to this amendment it was held that the following persons were competent witnesses and that the restriction in cl (4) of S 312 did not apply to them

1 Scope — The provisions of this section do not apply to a person who is of unsound mind. They apply to persons who are unable to understand the proceedings from deafness or dumbness or ignorance of the language of the country or other similar cause¹. Where the inability to understand the proceedings is due to unsoundness of mind, the procedure to be followed is that provided for in chap XXIV.² Where a Magistrate found an accused to be of poor wits and wanting in apprehension of the serious consequences of his acts and incapable of understanding anything, the High Court directed that the Magistrate should hold an enquiry into the question, whether the accused was a lunatic at the time of the trial or at the time he committed the act, that if he found that he was not a lunatic at either of those times he should proceed under S 341 and that if he convicted the accused he should report the case to the High Court³. The fact that the accused is deaf and dumb does not per se justify a reference under S 341. He must also be unable to understand the proceedings⁴.

Whether a Magistrate can pass sentence See Note 2

1 Scope—The provisions of this section do not apply to a person who is of unsound mind. They apply to persons who are unable to understand the proceedings from deafness or dumbness or ignorance of the language of the country or other similar cause¹ Where the inability to understand the proceedings is due to unsoundness of mind the procedure to be followed is that provided for in Chap XXIV² Where a Magistrate found an accused to be of poor wits and wanting in apprehension of the serious consequences of his acts and incapable of understanding anything, the High Court directed that the Magistrate should hold an enquiry into the question, whether the accused was a lunatic at the time of the trial or at the time he committed the act, that if he found that he was not a lunatic at either of those times he should proceed under S 311 and that if he convicted the accused, he should report the case to the High Court³ The fact that the accused is deaf and dumb does not per se justify a reference under S 311 He must also be *unable to understand the proceedings*⁴

with the necessity for permission so far as muktears are concerned. As regards other persons, the provision regarding permission still holds good. An estate manager may be a pleader provided he has the permission of the Court to plead.⁴ A Prosecuting Inspector may, with the Court's permission, defend an accused person.⁵ In the undermentioned case⁶ third class advocates in Burma would appear to have required permission to plead and act in a Sessions Court. See also Notes on S 4 (1) (r).

Though prior to the amendment muktears required the Court's permission to constitute them pleaders in a particular case, it was held that it would rarely be a wise discretion on the part of the Court to refuse permission to a muktear to appear for the defence as it would be depriving parties of legal aid which they can frequently obtain at a moderate cost.⁷

The practice of permitting private vakils to defend parties is not illegal as it is left to the discretion of the Magistrate to hear such agents or not.⁸

The discretion must be exercised in respect of each case individually and a general order prohibiting a person from appearing in any case in any Court or Courts is illegal.⁹ If a person is aggrieved by the refusal of a Magistrate to allow him to appear in a particular case he may move the High Court in revision.¹⁰ But when the case is ended, it would be useless to proceed with a revision petition in respect of the order refusing permission; the accused may, however, take it as a ground of appeal that he has been deprived of legal assistance.¹¹

12 Sub-section (2) — It was assumed in the undermentioned case¹ that the class of persons specified in this sub-section referred to accused persons and it was held that the Legislature removed, in the case of this particular class of persons, a disability which ordinarily attached to accused persons. According to another view, the new sub-section does not remove the restraint from any class of accused persons but only makes it clear that the persons mentioned therein are not really accused persons to whom the restriction against being put on oath would apply.²

Even prior to this amendment it was held that the following persons were competent witnesses and that the restriction in cl. (4) of S 312 did not apply to them:

(1) Persons against whom an order of maintenance is sought under S 489.³

(2) Parties proceeded against under S 145,⁴ and a party to proceeding under S 131⁵

As regards persons proceeded against under S 488, in a case decided after the amendment, it was held that by the omission of the word "accused" in subs (9) of S 488, the Legislature intended that such persons should no longer be looked upon as accused persons⁶

341.* If the accused, though not insane, cannot be made to understand the proceedings, the Court may proceed with the inquiry or trial, and, in the case of a Court other than a High Court, if such inquiry results in a commitment, or if such trial results in a conviction, the proceedings shall be forwarded to the High Court with a report of the circumstances of the case, and the High Court shall pass thereon such order as it thinks fit.

1 Scope — The provisions of this section do not apply to a person who is of unsound mind. They apply to persons who are unable to understand the proceedings from deafness or dumbness or ignorance of the language of the country or other similar cause¹. Where the inability to understand the proceedings is due to unsoundness of mind the procedure to be followed is that provided for in Chap XXIV². Where a Magistrate found an accused to be of poor wits and wanting in apprehension of the serious consequences of his acts and incapable of understanding anything, the High Court directed that the Magistrate should hold an enquiry into the question whether the accused was a lunatic at the time of the trial or at the time he committed the act that if he found that he was not a lunatic at either of those times, he should proceed under S 341 and that if he convicted the accused, he should report the case to the High Court³. The fact that the accused is deaf and dumb does not per se justify a reference under S 341. He must also be *unable to understand the proceedings*⁴.

2. Duties and powers of Court other than the High Court. — If the Magistrate is of opinion that the accused cannot be made to understand the proceedings, he should nevertheless proceed with the enquiry or trial till the end and if it results in a conviction or committal, the proceedings should be forwarded to the High Court with a report as to the circumstances of the case¹ He should not proceed to pass sentence on the accused, but having convicted him should stay proceedings and report the matter to the High Court for orders² Nor is he empowered to pass an order under S 562 of the Code³

The view being, that it is impossible for a deaf mute to have lived to maturity, without being able to communicate with his relatives, High Courts have insisted on Magistrates attempting to find out whether the accused (if he is deaf and dumb) has any friends or relatives, who are accustomed to communicate with him, his antecedents and ordinary mode of life, and the manner in which he was communicated with, in the ordinary affairs of life The Magistrate should attempt to get into communication with the accused with the assistance of his relatives⁴ The omission to attempt to communicate with the accused is clearly wrong, where there was such a failure, and the High Court was not able to say that the accused were not prejudiced, the conviction was set aside⁵ If no failure of justice has, however, occurred the High Court may decline to interfere with the conviction⁶

Summary procedure is not suitable to the case of accused who cannot be made to understand the proceedings⁷

3. Proceedings shall be forwarded to the High Court.—There should be a conviction or committal before a reference is made to the High Court¹ If a reference is made before a conviction or committal the record will be returned to the trying Magistrate to be reported by him only if he convicts or commits the accused²

In submitting a case to the High Court under this section the Magistrate must state his view of the conduct of the accused in the commission of the offence his previous history and habits There must also be a finding whether the accused was capable of understanding and did in fact understand the nature of the proceedings and the purport of the evidence given by the witnesses³ the report should also state the reason for the Magistrate's holding that the accused did not understand the proceedings what means were used to make him understand them and the reason why such means were unsuccessful⁴

The proceedings to be forwarded to the High Court under this section are only those relating to an accused person who cannot be made to understand the proceedings though not insane If in a case there are two accused and one of them though not insane is not able to understand the proceedings the Magistrate is not to refer the proceedings of both to the High Court and the High Court under this section will have no jurisdiction to pass any order with regard to the accused who is able to understand the proceedings⁵

3a Non compliance with the section—Effect — In the undermentioned case¹ the accused a deaf mute unable to understand the proceedings was committed to the sessions for trial Instead of submitting the case to the High Court under the provisions of this section the Sessions Judge tried the case and acquitted the accused It was held that though the Sessions Judge was wrong in proceeding to try the accused the trial was not completely void under s 530

4 "High Court shall pass thereon such order as it thinks fit" — The High Court has in a case reported under this section full discretion to do whatever the circumstances of the case require¹ Although the prisoner had not been able to understand the proceedings and therefore those proceedings had not according to the principles of English common law constituted a fair and proper trial yet under special circumstances if the High Court should think fit it might treat them as amounting to a sufficient trial and pass sentence according to the facts which seem to be established in the course of and as a result of those proceedings²

The unrestricted powers vested in the High Court in dealing with cases under this section warrant its ordering that the accused be confined in a suitable place of safe custody

1 Legislative changes. — Under the Code of 1861, it was not incumbent on the Magistrate to examine the accused, whether before or after the close of the prosecution case¹ It was in the discretion of the Court to do so or not² In the Code of 1872, the discretionary nature of the examination was retained so far as enquiries and trials, other than sessions trials, were concerned So far as sessions trials were concerned, such examination was made compulsory³ In the Code of 1892, the purpose of the examination was set forth in the section

2 Scope of the section. — This section provides for the examination by the Court of accused persons and except under the circumstances and restrictions set forth in this section an accused person is incapable of being examined by the Court⁴

The section is based on the principle involved in the maxim audi alteram partem, namely, that no one should be condemned unheard,⁵ and the accused should be heard, not merely on what is prima facie proved against him, but on every circumstance appearing in evidence against him⁶

The section does not purport to be only in the interest of the accused, its object is to enable the accused to explain any circumstances appearing against him in the evidence, the intention of the provision is for the furtherance of justice and to enable the Court to decide the question of the guilt of the accused⁴ The result of the examination may be beneficial to the accused but it may equally be injurious to him⁵

2 Scope of the section. — This section provides for the examination by the Court of accused persons and except under the circumstances and restrictions set forth in this section an accused person is incapable of being examined by the Court¹

The section is based on the principle involved in the maxim audi alteram partem, namely, that no one should be condemned unheard,² and the accused should be heard, not merely on what is prima facie proved against him but on every circumstance appearing in evidence against him.³

The section does not purport to be only in the interest of the accused, its object is to enable the accused to explain any circumstances appearing against him in the evidence, the intention of the provision is for the furtherance of justice and to enable the Court to decide the question of the guilt of the accused.⁴ The result of the examination may be beneficial to the accused but it may equally be injurious to him.⁵

Karuna Shanlar.

The section consists of two parts the first part giving a discretion to the Court⁶ the second part being *mandatory*⁷ At any stage of the inquiry or trial the Court may put such questions to the accused as it considers necessary for the purpose specified in the section After the prosecution witnesses have been examined and before the accused is called on for his defence the Court shall question generally on the case for the said purpose

The accused must be examined under the section whether he offers to produce defence or not The wording of the section does not justify the interpretation that it is necessary to examine the accused under this section only if he offers to produce defence⁸ But it has been held by the Bombay High Court that a Court is not bound under this section to give the accused an opportunity of explaining the circumstances appearing against him in the evidence of witnesses examined on behalf of a co accused though the Court may give him such an opportunity⁹

The power to question the accused in regard to the evidence which has been given, must be distinguished from the power to record statements which the accused may offer to make the Court can only properly question the accused under the conditions named in the section but it may record statements offered by the accused and to such statements this section does not apply¹⁰

It was held in the undermentioned cases¹¹ that this section and ss 164 and 364 are

3. Applicability to summons cases and summary trials. — The High Court of Madras has held that this section does not apply to summons cases and that consequently it is not obligatory on the Court to examine the accused, though it may be desirable to do so¹. The ground, on which the decision proceeds, is that in summons cases there is no procedure for calling upon the accused for his defence, as in sessions cases and warrant cases (ss 259, 256), but only for hearing the accused and that this section, which requires the Court to examine the accused before the accused is called on for his defence, has no application to such cases. A Full Bench of the High Court of Rangoon has also come to the same conclusion, on the additional ground that the words in s 245, namely "if he thinks fit" give a discretion to the Court to examine the accused or not and that such discretion is incompatible with the imperative provisions of this section². The general trend of opinion of all the other High Courts is, however, that this section applies equally to summons cases as well as to warrant cases³ and that the words "if he thinks fit" in s 245 have reference to cases in which the Magistrate is prepared to acquit the accused, even on a consideration of the prosecution evidence as it stands, without calling on the accused for his defence and without hearing him⁴.

4 Applicability to trials before Presidency Magistrates — Presidency Magistrates are not relieved from the obligation of questioning the accused generally under this section. The words 'if any' in S 370, clause (f), cannot be properly held as modifying the provisions of this section, as regards Presidency Magistrates¹. See also Section 370 Note 3.

5 Applicability to proceeding under Chapter VIII. — A person proceeded against under Chapter VIII of the Code (security proceedings) is not a person accused of any act or omission punishable by law and this section has no application to such cases¹.

6 Applicability to proceeding under section 363 of the Calcutta Municipal Act — A person proceeded against under S 363 of the Calcutta Municipal Act is not an accused person and this section has no application to such cases¹.

7 Applicability of section to proceeding under section 488 — A proceeding against a person under S 488 is of a civil nature and the person proceeded against is not an accused person. This section which applies to proceedings against accused persons cannot therefore, apply to proceedings under S 488¹.

8 Applicability to proceeding under section 476 — On the question as to whether proceedings in inquiries under S 476 of the Code are judicial proceedings and the persons against whom they are directed are in the position of accused persons and S 312 applies to such cases see S 476 Note 24.

9 When questions should be put — As seen in Note 2 the putting of questions under the first part of the section is discretionary and may be done at any stage of the inquiry or trial. sufficient compliance with the section⁶ There is a conflict of opinions as to whether an accused, who has been examined once before charge is framed, should be examined a second time, when the prosecution witnesses are re called under S 256 and cross examined a second time The High Courts of Calcutta⁷ Lahore⁸ and Madras⁹ and the Chief Court of Oudh¹⁰ have held that such second examination under this section is not necessary the High Court of Madras proceeding on the ground that cross examination after charge is really evidence for the defence and not for the prosecution The Allahabad High Court is also inclined to this view¹¹ The High Courts of Rangoon¹² and Patna¹³ and the Judicial Commissioners Courts of Nagpur¹⁴ and Peshawar¹⁵ have, on the other hand, held that a second examination, after the cross examination of the re called witnesses is necessary

When the accused enters upon his defence, the stage at which he must be examined passes It is no compliance with the section if the examination takes place at a later stage¹⁶ This section has therefore no application and no fresh examination of the accused is necessary where, for example, a prosecution witness is re called under S 257 (after the accused has entered on his defence) and cross examined¹⁷ or where additional evidence is

10. Examination after framing charge. — Provided the accused is examined after the prosecution evidence is completely closed, it makes no difference whether the examination takes place before or after the charge is framed.¹ Where witnesses are examined after charge, the accused must be questioned, under this section, after the close of such examination.²

11. "Evidence," meaning of. — The word "evidence" in this section means evidence already given at the inquiry or trial at the time of the examination.¹

12. Examination must be by the Court itself and not by others — The Court alone is authorized to examine the accused person and the counsel for the complainant or the prosecution should not be allowed to take part in the examination.¹ It is improper for a Magistrate to base his examination on detailed instructions given by the counsel for the prosecution.²

15 "Question him generally on the case" — As has been seen already in Note 2 it is imperative that the Court should question the accused generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence. There is a difference of opinion among the High Courts as to what is meant by questioning 'generally on the case'. According to one view, the word "generally" does not limit the nature of the questioning to one or more questions of a general nature relating to the case but means that the questions should relate to the whole case and should not be limited to particular part or parts of it, the law, therefore intends that the salient points appearing in the evidence against the accused must be pointed out to him in a succinct form and he should be asked to explain them if he wishes to do so¹. 15 "Question him generally on the case" — As has been seen already in Note 2 it is imperative that the Court should question the accused generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence. There is a difference of opinion among the High Courts as to what is meant by questioning 'generally on the case'. According to one view, the word 'generally' does not limit the nature of the questioning to one or more questions of a general nature relating to the case but means that the questions should relate to the whole case and should not be limited to particular part or parts of it, the law, therefore, intends that the salient points appearing in the evidence against the accused must be pointed out to him in a succinct form and he should be asked to explain them if he wishes to do so¹. asking anything which may lead the accused to incriminate himself, the important points against him may be brought to his notice and he may have an opportunity of explaining them. The task is such a difficult one that, when the accused is represented by counsel, it is often in his interest that the Judge should formally comply with the section by asking a general question and then leave the accused's counsel to offer explanations on his behalf in the way most favourable and least dangerous to him."

According to a third view, the question as to what must be the nature of the questions to be put depends upon the circumstances of each case, it would however be a sufficient compliance with the section if the accused is given an opportunity of explaining the circumstances appearing against him, it is neither necessary nor desirable to examine the accused in detail so as to enable the prosecution to take advantage thereof⁹

"The other question is a general question whether there was anything else he desired to say about the charges or the evidence. The learned Chief Justice told the jury that the absence of blood in the body cavity was a vital point. If so, it is plain that under s 342 of the Code, it was the duty of the examining Judge to call the accused's attention to this point and ask for an explanation."

The first of the three views set out above must, in the light of the Privy Council decision, be accepted as correct. After the above Privy Council decision, the Madras High Court adopted this view in the cases cited below¹¹. But in the undermentioned decision¹² of the same High Court the Privy Council decision was distinguished and it was held that where the accused has shown by his replies that he has understood all the points against him and has attempted to explain them, the failure of the Judge to put to him all the items of evidence leading to the inference of his guilt is not material.

A long composite question should not be asked, but separate questions on the various points should be put and the explanation of the accused asked¹³. The High Court of Madras has, in the undermentioned case,¹⁴ deprecated the habit, cultivated by the Courts since the Privy Council decision, of summarising the whole evidence and asking the accused what he has to say with regard to it.

16 "Without previously warning the accused" — The section does not require, as in the case of statements taken under s 164, that the accused shall be warned of the consequences of the statements he makes¹. It has however, been held in the undermentioned case* that it is extremely desirable that the Magistrate should follow the practice in England and warn the accused that they are not obliged to answer unless they desire to do so

17 Examination of pleader of accused — There is a conflict of opinions as to whether this section enables the Court to examine the pleader of the accused in cases where the personal attendance of the accused has been dispensed with under S 205. According to the High Courts of Allahabad,¹ Calcutta² and Madras³ the examination must be of the accused in person who should be directed under sub s (2) of S 205 to be present for the purpose. The High Courts of Bombay⁴ and Rangoon⁵ and the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Sind⁶ have, on the other hand held that the Magistrate is not bound to examine the accused personally in such cases

18 Written statement of accused, if sufficient — Under the Code of 1861 where the examination of the accused was in the discretion of the Court it was held that where a written defence was given it was not necessary for the Magistrate to examine the accused orally.¹ The latter part of the present section is however as has been seen already mandatory and the accused is not entitled as of right to put in a written statement in lieu of answers which he may give to questions put to him under this section.² It has been generally held that this section contemplates an oral examination³ that a written statement of defence cannot be allowed to take the place of the examination which this section imperatively orders the Court to make⁴ and that the practice of taking such statements is pernicious⁵ and entirely irresponsible.⁶ A written statement drafted by the accused's legal adviser, for instance can never have the same value as answers coming directly from the accused's mouth.⁷ In the undermentioned cases,⁸ however, it was held that the filing of a written statement of defence dispensed with the necessity to examine the accused orally under this section. It is submitted that this view is not correct and is against the general trend of opinion.

The immunity under sub s (c) of the section does not extend to a written statement filed by the accused. See also Note 12 on Section 256.

19 Examination by committing Magistrate — A committing Magistrate is bound before commitment to examine the accused, as required by this section. The words 'and he has (if necessary) examined the accused' in S 209 of the Code cannot be taken as giving a discretion to the Magistrate who intends to commit, to examine the accused.¹ The Calcutta High Court, however, has in the undermentioned case,² held that the mandatory provisions of this section apply only to the Sessions Court in such cases, as it is in that Court that the accused is called on for his defence. A similar view has also been taken by the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Sind.³ See also Section 287 and Notes thereon.

v Dosu (Examination o

20. Examination of accused in sessions trials — The section is a general provision applicable to trials in all cases including sessions cases, and even where the accused has been examined generally by the committing Magistrate, the Sessions Judge is bound to examine the accused in the trial.¹ It makes a considerable difference to listeners, like the jury, whether a statement before the Magistrate is read out in Court, or whether an accused person is carefully examined in the presence of the jury and his answers and demeanour noted by the jury.² A contrary view has, however, been taken in the under-mentioned case,³ based upon the interpretation of the words, 'if any' used in s 280 of the Code. It is submitted that this view is not correct. The words 'if any' in s 280 should not be construed as conflicting with this section. Section 289 must be taken to contemplate the case in which there are no circumstances for the accused to explain.⁴ See also Section 289, Note 3.

21. Refusal to answer — Sub-section (2) — An accused person is entitled to refuse to answer questions put to him under this section,¹ and when he does so the Court is not bound to go on questioning him.² Nor should the Court hold inquisitorial proceedings against him in such a case.³

Where an accused declines to answer questions put to him under this section, the fact should be noted on the record.⁴

Although an accused is entitled to refuse to answer, such refusal may often be attended with great risk to him, inasmuch as the Court and the jury, if any, may draw such inference against him from such refusal as it thinks just.⁵ An innocent man cannot well injure himself by a truthful explanation of the circumstances appearing against him.⁶

An accused person does not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer questions put to him⁷

As to whether an accused person can refuse to sign the record of his examination under S 364 and the effect of such refusal, see S 364, Note 10

The fact that the accused declines to make a statement will not necessarily indicate that he would not like to answer specific questions⁸

22 Giving false answers—Sub-section (2) — An accused person does not, by giving false answers to the questions put to him under this section, render himself liable to punishment. The resort to a false defence will, however, affect the credit to be attached to the case of the accused and raise an inference against him, though this will not relieve the Court from the task of attempting to arrive at a sound conclusion from the whole evidence, inasmuch as notwithstanding his false defence, the accused may be innocent of the offence charged¹

23 Answers given to be taken into consideration — Where facts are put forward on behalf of the prosecution, which unless explained, justify an inference of guilt being drawn against the accused, it is both lawful and proper for the Court to consider the explanation of those facts, which the accused puts forward in his defence¹. In cases of circumstantial evidence the Court should always take the explanation of the accused into consideration². The burden of proving an exception under the Penal Code is on the accused³

and in such cases, the circumstances, with his statement, may be sufficient to establish the exception in his favour⁴

The proof of a case against the accused must depend, not on the absence of an explanation on his part, but upon the positive affirmative evidence of his guilt given by the prosecution⁵. Where, however, the prosecution evidence prima facie establishes his guilt or involves him in considerable suspicion, his absence of explanation may give rise to an inference against him⁶. But when the prosecution evidence is entirely untrustworthy it is not open to the Court to rely upon the admissions of the accused made in a statement under this section and to base a conviction thereon⁷. But the Chief Court of Sind has held that if the statement of the accused amounts to a confession and it is true and voluntary, it is sufficient for a conviction even though the prosecution evidence as to his guilt is totally disbelieved⁸.

The answers given can only be 'taken into consideration' in the inquiry or trial in which they are given. They cannot be allowed to fill up a gap in the prosecution evidence: the prosecution must make out its case by evidence⁹. Thus, where in a prosecution for defamation, no evidence was let in to prove publication it was held that the admission of publication, made by the accused in his statement under this section was not sufficient to fill up the gap in the prosecution evidence¹⁰. Similarly, in a prosecution for murder, where

27 Answers by one accused, if can be considered against co accused — It has already been seen that the answers given by the accused can be used only for or against him and not against others. There is no indication in the language of this section that the answers given by one accused under this section could be considered against his co accused. On the question whether statements made under this section can be taken into consideration under s 30 of the Evidence Act against a co accused, there is a divergence of judicial opinion. The Bombay High Court has held that for the purposes of s 30, there is no distinction between a confession made by an accused before the trial and one made by him in the course of the trial and hence a confession made by one accused in the course of his statement under this section can be taken into consideration against his co accused under s 30 of the Evidence Act¹. The Lahore High Court agrees with this view². But the Allahabad³ Madras⁴ Calcutta⁵ and Nagpur⁶ High Courts have taken a contrary view on the ground that s 30 of the Evidence Act refers only to a confession made before the trial and not in the course of the trial. It is submitted that the latter view is correct. The reason is this s 30 of the Evidence Act requires that the confession must be proved before the Court. Under s 3 of the Evidence Act a fact is said to be proved when on considering the matters before it the Court believes such fact to exist or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought under the circumstances of the case to act upon the supposition that it exists. When a confession is made before a Court in the course of a trial, the Court perceives with his own senses the fact of the confession and knows such fact. The Court does not believe it or consider it to be probable. See also s 255 Note 8 and s 271, Note 15.

28 Several accused—Each to be examined separately.—Where there are several accused in a case, it is incumbent on the Magistrate to examine each of them separately. A joint statement of all the accused in a single paragraph is not authorized by the section¹. Where after the Judge took an explanation from one of the accused persons as regards the nature of his defence and subsequently took another statement from a co accused under this section it was held that he was entitled to do so².

Where there are several accused the case of each of them should be individually considered and each of them should be questioned with reference to the particular position brought out by the evidence against him³.

29 Accused's defence in general—The nature of the defence should be ascertained not only from the statement of the accused but from the trend of the cross examination of the prosecution witnesses and from the arguments of the accused's pleader at the close of the trial¹.

An accused person is entitled to put forward any defence open to him technical or otherwise and to have the Court's judgment on it². Nor is there anything in law to prevent him from setting up alternative and inconsistent defences,³ though such defence may ordinarily weaken his case.⁴ It is open to an accused person to plead the right of private defence either specifically, or in the alternative.⁵

It is not the affair of the defence to explain or to supply gaps in the prosecution evidence.⁶ Nor can the Court call upon the accused to frame a theory, particularly in a case of difficulty in which the theory of the prosecution is itself not clear.⁷ Where however, a prima facie case is made out by the prosecution, it is the duty of the defence to rebut the presumption arising therefrom by some tangible evidence.⁸

An accused can make admissions of facts at his trial, which may relieve the prosecution from bringing evidence to prove such admitted facts. A plea of guilty is an extreme instance of such an admission and a decision may be based thereon.⁹

Where an accused person is convicted he ceases to be an accused person¹⁸. Where therefore one of several co-accused is convicted on his plea of guilty he becomes a competent witness against others who were originally jointly put up for trial with him¹⁹. It was also held in the undermentioned case²⁰ that where an accused person pleads guilty, his incompetency of being a witness is removed though he is convicted on such plea some time later. Where a prosecution is withdrawn against one of several accused under s 474 he ceases to be an accused person and is a competent witness to whom an oath can be administered in further proceedings against others²¹.

A criminal appeal is a continuation of the criminal case and the appellant has the privilege of the accused and cannot be administered an oath²².

A Magistrate should not put persons on oath unless he is satisfied of his authority to do so. Where he examines persons against whom a complaint is laid before issue of process the procedure is irregular and illegal²³.

Section 10 of the Bombay Gambling Act 1887 empowers the Magistrate to examine as witnesses any of the persons arrested and brought before him in accordance with s 6(b).

thereof This procedure is a special procedure which overrides the general law enacted in this section²⁴ A contrary view was, however, expressed in the undermentioned case²⁵

In the undermentioned case²⁶ it was held that a proceeding for the forfeiture of recognizances is in the nature of a civil proceeding and that the person proceeded against can give evidence on oath on his own behalf

32 Examination of accused in cross case as a witness — Where there is a case and a counter or cross case both pending it was held in the undermentioned cases¹ that the examination of the accused in the one case as witness in the other constituted a grave irregularity as it was impossible to assume in such a case that the evidence so given could be impartial This view it is submitted cannot be accepted as correct if it means that such examination is not authorized by the law The said view has not been followed in later cases² In any case if the accused is not prejudiced by the course adopted it will not vitiate the trial³ See also the undermentioned cases⁴

32a Applicability of section to proceedings under section 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act — The High Court of Madras has held that a pleader against whom proceedings are taken under S 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act is an accused person and he cannot be solemnly affirmed¹ The High Court of Calcutta has in the undermentioned case² taken a contrary view

32b Applicability to proceedings under section 145 — None of the parties litigating under S 145 can be called an accused person and therefore they can be examined as witnesses in the case¹

33 Examination of accused — How recorded — See Section 364

34 Destruction of record — Proof of examination — Where the records have been destroyed and in his explanation the Magistrate states that the accused was examined under this section his statement must be accepted¹

the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in *Subramania Ayyar v King-Emperor to the following effect

Their Lordships are unable to regard the disobedience to an express provision as to a mode of trial as a mere irregularity. Such a phrase, as irregularity, is not appropriate to the illegality of trying an accused person for many different offences at the same time and those offences being spread over a longer period than by law could have been joined together in one indictment.

In the undermentioned cases³ a contrary view has been expressed, namely, that a non-compliance with the section does not vitiate the trial unless the accused has been reproduced by the procedure adopted in Abdul Rahman v King Emperor,⁴ which was a case arising under S 300 of the Code their Lordships of the Privy Council distinguished Sulramania Iyyar & case on the ground that in that case the procedure adopted was one which the Code positively prohibited and held that an omission or irregularity in the case of other provisions of the Code unaccompanied by any probable suggestion of any failure of justice having been thereby occasioned is not enough to warrant the quashing of a conviction. It is submitted that unless the provisions of this section are construed as conveying a positive prohibition the cases holding that a non-compliance ipso facto vitiates conviction require reconsideration.

Where the non-compliance with the section is held to vitiate the trial whether by reason of prejudice to the accused or independently of any prejudice, ordinarily, the proper course is to order a re-trial from the stage at which the provisions of this section were not complied with.⁵ In other words the matter should be set right by again questioning the accused as required by this section and then by calling on him to enter on his defence⁶ The Court remanding the case should not keep the case on its own file and simply call for a re submission after taking the necessary examination, it should remand the whole case to be tried on the merits as if it were before the Court for the first time⁷ But where the case is a petty one⁸ or the offence is merely technical⁹ it has been held that it is not in the interest of justice that the case should be tried de novo and that the accused should be acquitted

Where questions are put in contravention of the section such as questions in the nature of cross examination,¹⁰ or where further evidence is taken after the examination of the accused and the latter is not examined again under this section,¹¹ the answers given in the one case and the further evidence taken in the other should be rejected and not taken into account It will not be proper for the Judge to take into consideration circumstances appearing in the prosecution evidence against the accused if he had not drawn his attention to them in his examination and called for an explanation¹² In cases where the evidence against the accused is entirely circumstantial unless the Magistrate has elicited from the accused any explanation he has to give in respect of the facts appearing in evidence against him the trial will be vitiated and conviction based on such evidence cannot be sustained¹³

Where the pardon tendered turns out to be illegal under S 337, it would be unlawful to examine the accused as a witness and his statement would be irrelevant and inadmissible in evidence²

3 No influence, etc. — An accused person is neither bound nor is under an obligation to make any admission injurious to his own interests. No judicial officer should attempt to compel him to make any such admission¹. Where however, the accused wishes to make a statement of his own accord, it is not necessary that the Magistrate should give him any caution before taking his statement². The eliciting of an admission by putting words into the mouth of the accused is unfair³.

An accused person is not bound to produce his co accused who are absconding and the Court cannot exercise any pressure upon him for the purpose of producing them⁴.

An assurance of amnesty given to a witness is not within the mischief of the section and does not affect the competency of the witness, though it may affect his credibility⁵.

4 Evidentiary value of statements — See also Note 6 on S 163. This section does not declare what the consequences would be if an accused person did make a statement under inducement¹. It seems to be however, clear that the statements so made would be inadmissible in evidence.

344. (1) If, from the absence of a witness, or any other reasonable cause, it becomes necessary or advisable to postpone the commencement of, or adjourn any inquiry or trial, the Court may, if it thinks fit, by order in writing, stating the reasons therefor, from time to time, postpone or adjourn the same on such terms as it thinks fit, for such time as it considers reasonable, and may by a warrant remand the accused if in custody.

Provided that no Magistrate shall remand an accused person to Remand custody under this section for a term exceeding fifteen days at a time,

(2) Every order made under this section by a Court other than a High Court shall be in writing signed by the presiding Judge or Magistrate.

Explanation — If sufficient evidence has been obtained to raise a suspicion that the accused may have committed an offence, and it appears likely that further evidence may be obtained by a remand, this is a reasonable cause for a remand.

1 Legislative changes — There was no separate chapter in the Codes of 1861 and 1872 dealing with the general provisions applicable to all kinds of trials. Hence a provision of adjournment was made under each chapter relating to different proceedings such as preliminary inquiry by Magistrates trial of warrant cases of summons cases and sessions trials. When the 1882 Code was passed recasting in many respects the two former Codes some of the general provisions applicable to all kinds of trials were clubbed together in chap XXIV and the Court's power to adjourn and remand was provided for in S 344. The section as re-enacted provided also for the postponement of the commencement of an inquiry or trial for which there was no provision in the Codes of 1861 and 1872. In the present Code the words if it thinks fit in sub s (1) were inserted between the words the Court may and by order in writing etc.

2 Scope and applicability of the section — This section provides for the postponement of the commencement or the adjournment of any inquiry or trial and also for remand of the accused where such postponement or adjournment is made. Thus after a Magistrate has taken cognizance of an offence his powers of postponement and adjournment are regulated by this section ¹.

The policy of law is that criminal cases should be disposed of with the least possible delay ².

The object is to avoid hardship to the parties and witnesses³ If the accused is in custody, frequent adjournments will be a harassment to him and, from the point of view of the prosecution, time will efface recollection of facts The longer the period allowed to elapse from the time of the arrest to the time the witnesses give evidence, the greater is the probability of confusion and of the truth being obscured⁴ The section consequently provides that a postponement or adjournment can be given only in two cases —

(1) where witnesses are absent or

(2) for any other reasonable cause⁵

It is not expedient for a sessions trial to be adjourned When once begun such trial should be continued de die in diem — from day to day — until it is finished⁶ The section applies only to proceedings in inquiries and trials It does not apply to appeals,⁷ or to proceedings in revision⁸

As to other provisions relating to adjournment, see Sections 229, 508 and 526

3 Postponement and adjournment — The section empowers the Court not only to adjourn an enquiry or trial, but to postpone its commencement Thus, a Magistrate receiving a complaint may postpone the issue of a process under S 204, and is not bound to

In the undermentioned case² the Bombay High Court pointed out the desirability of having a fixed time each day for the purpose of appointing new dates for cases which cannot be reached on that day

4 Postponement of case sine die — A postponement or adjournment of a case sine die is not in accordance with this or any other provision of the Code¹ The postponement or adjournment under this section can only be from time to time and for such time as the Court considers reasonable i.e. for *fixed and definite periods*² See also Note 11

5 Inquiry or trial — See Section 4 (1) clause (h)

5a Adjournment by public proclamation — An adjournment must under this section be by an order in writing It is irregular and objectionable to adjourn a trial by public proclamation¹

6 "May, if it thinks fit," — These words show that the question of postponement or adjournment of an enquiry or trial is a matter of the Court's discretion The discretion is however not an arbitrary one but should be exercised judiciously and only in cases which come within the terms of this section¹

A Court is not obliged to pay attention to a telegram from a pleader of one of the parties asking for adjournment*

7. Reasonable cause for adjournment. — An adjournment can be granted only on the ground of the *absence of a witness*¹ or for any other *reasonable cause*² As a general rule Magistrates should refrain from granting adjournments save in cases where they are clearly necessitated for the purposes of justice³

The following have been held to be good grounds for adjournment :

- (1) To enable the accused to secure the attendance of his witnesses⁴
- (2) To enable an accused to examine such of his witnesses as he has produced⁵
- (3) To enable an accused to engage the services of a pleader to properly defend himself in complicated cases⁶
- (4) Where the accused's advocate is absent at another place to fulfill a long standing engagement⁷
- (5) Where a large number of witnesses have been examined for the prosecution and the accused wants two days' time to consider what evidence he should produce⁸
- (6) Where the counsel for the accused in a capital case wants to cross examine the witnesses on the following day as he was not prepared to cross examine on that day⁹
- (7) Where a party is asked to cross examine a witness at 6.30 P. M., and he asks for time on the ground that the pleader is not then available¹⁰
- (8) Where the accused is tried for separate offences and an appeal is pending against the conviction in respect of one of such offences.¹¹
- (9) Where a new witness is produced in the Sessions Court who was not examined before the committing Magistrate and the accused wants time on the ground that it is a surprise to him¹²

(10) For producing material documents filed in a civil case¹³

(11) Where in a sessions trial it is found that a witness is absent and therefore his deposition before the committing Magistrate could not be received and the witness has consequently to be summoned¹⁴

The following have been held not to be sufficient grounds for granting an adjournment

(1) To enable the accused to get a ruling from the High Court on a point of law¹⁵

(2) The absence of a co accused and desirability of a joint trial¹⁶

(3) To enable the complainant to examine witnesses whom he had not cared to have in attendance.¹⁷

(4) To enable a party to summon witnesses where sufficient time has already been allowed for the purpose¹⁸

(5) To enable the prosecution to find out evidence the existence of which is entirely problematical¹⁹ The High Court of Lahore has however, held that an adjournment may be granted to give opportunity to the complainant to collect evidence though for such purpose it should be sparingly granted²⁰

(6) To enable the prosecution to examine witnesses not named in the *chalan*²¹

(7) To enable the pleader of one of the parties in a petty case to be present where the pleader of the opposite party was present and the date had been announced beforehand²²

(8) The absence of the counsel of one of the accused in a sessions case in which a number of witnesses had been summoned²³

A Full Bench of the High Court of Lahore has held that this Code is not applicable to contempt proceedings and that even if S 344 be held applicable to such proceedings where the Court is scandalised and an attempt is made by a scurrilous publication to undermine and impair the authority of the Court, immediate action is necessary to vindicate the authority of the Court and the proceedings will not be adjourned merely

8. "Stating the reasons therefor" — The reasons for the adjournment should be clearly expressed on record. It is not enough that a reasonable cause exists. Such cause should be stated in the order as the prisoner is entitled to know what such cause is, and an appellate Court cannot form an opinion of its reasonableness unless it is stated on record¹

9 Adjournment to and trial on holiday. — A trial of an accused person on a Sunday or other holiday would not necessarily make the proceedings illegal or invalid¹. Where however, the result of taking the unusual procedure of trying the case on a holiday is to cause prejudice to the accused as for example, by preventing him from engaging a pleader to defend him, the conviction will be set aside²

10 Advancement of hearing — This section does not stand in the way of the Court advancing the hearing of a case to an earlier date, provided due notice thereof is given to the parties¹. An acceleration of the date of hearing against the wishes of the accused or his pleader is not proper²

11 Stay of criminal proceedings — This section authorizes only the postponement or adjournment of a criminal case from time to time and does not contemplate a stay of proceedings for an indefinite period (see Note 4 above). But every Court has an inherent power to stay a case pending on its file where it is necessary for the ends of justice to do so¹. The power of the High Court in this respect is expressly recognized by the accused is likely to be prejudiced if the criminal proceeding is not stayed until the disposal of the suit.⁷ Where the matter in issue is not of such a complicated kind for the decision of which Civil Courts are preferred as peculiarly qualified as, for example, the genuineness of a will or other document, the validity of a will, and the bona fides of a civil claim, it cannot be assumed that there will be a manifest and irreparable injustice done in the Criminal Court when the integrity of the Court is not questioned.⁸

In exercising the discretion in the matter of stay, the following principles may be remembered

- (1) Where a criminal proceeding is instituted with the motive of hampering the conduct of the civil proceeding, the former may be ordered to be stayed.⁹ This, however, will not apply in the case of public prosecutions, such as prosecutions under S 193 or S 476, Criminal Procedure Code.¹⁰

No costs of adjournment can be awarded in criminal appeals¹³ or criminal revisions¹⁴ as the section does not apply to such proceedings. So also an adjournment granted on intimation by a party under S 526 (8) about his intention to move the High Court for transfer is not an adjournment under this section and therefore a Magistrate has no power to award costs of such adjournment¹⁵

15a Adjournment for cross examination of prosecution witnesses in trials of warrant cases — Power to impose terms on accused — In trials of warrant cases the accused has a statutory right to the re call of prosecution witnesses for cross examination after the charge is framed and he cannot be ordered to pay the expenses of the witnesses in such cases. See Notes on S 256. But this right applies only to the first re call of the witnesses. Where once the witnesses are re called but the accused asks for an adjournment of the case on the ground of the absence of his pleader the Court can under this section grant him the adjournment on condition of his paying bhatta to the prosecution witnesses¹

16 Remand — A remand is a re committal to custody of a person who has been brought up in custody.¹ The scheme of the Code as to the detention of the accused persons in custody is as follows

A person arrested without warrant should be brought before a Magistrate without unnecessary delay (Ss 59 and 60) the maximum period of police custody allowed being twenty four hours (S 61). A person arrested under a warrant is similarly to be brought before a Magistrate without unnecessary delay (S 81). On the arrested person being so brought before the Magistrate the Magistrate may from time to time authorize the detention of the accused either in police custody or in the judicial lock up as he thinks fit for a term not exceeding fifteen days on the whole (S 167). If within that period the investigation shows that there is not sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion against the accused he should be released by the investigating officer on taking security for appearance before the Magistrate if and when he is required (S 169). If within that period the investigation shows that there is such evidence or if the period expires without the investigation having been completed the accused must be forwarded subject to the provisions as to bail to the Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence upon a police report (S 170). If the latter also receives along with the accused a police report under S 173 he can take cognizance of the offence on such report and if necessary remand the accused to custody for fifteen days at a time for the purpose of obtaining further evidence or for other reasonable cause (S 344). If owing to the investigation not having been completed a final report is not sent with the accused under S 173 the Magistrate should release the accused. He cannot order a remand in such a case². The High Court of Allahabad has however in the undermentioned case³ held that S 10 applies only to cases where the investigation has not been completed and further that even where accused is sent up under that section without any report under S 173, the Magistrate can order a remand of the accused under this section and is not bound to release him. It is submitted that this view cannot be accepted as correct. This section clearly applies only where the Magistrate has taken cognizance of the offence and thus he could do only on a police report or in the other modes referred to in S 190. In the absence, therefore, of a police report or the other things referred to in S 190 the Magistrate could not act, and there being no sustaining order for detention, the accused must be released.

17. Distinction between detention under section 167 and under section 344.

- (1) Section 167 applies to detention of accused persons during police investigation. This section applies to detention after police investigation and before or pending inquiry or trial¹. Thus, where a Magistrate, having ordered the accused to be detained for a period of less than fifteen days, thinks no further detention is necessary and sends him to a Magistrate having jurisdiction, a remand by the latter Magistrate will be one under this section and not under S 167.²
- (2) The maximum period of detention under S 167 can be only fifteen days. The period of detention under this section cannot exceed fifteen days at a time though the sum total of the periods of detention may exceed fifteen days³.
- (3) A detention under S. 167 may be either in police custody or in judicial lock up. A detention under this section can only be in a judicial lock up.⁴
- (4) A Magistrate acting under S. 167 need not be one who has jurisdiction to try or commit the case. A Magistrate acting under this section must, however, be one who has such jurisdiction⁵.

See also Note 7 on Section 167.

18. Grounds of remand. — The words "may by a warrant remand" show that the Magistrate has a discretion in the matter of granting a remand¹. The discretion must, however, be a judicial one to be exercised in accordance with legal principles. The detention of an accused is not intended to be penal: its object is only to secure the attendance of the accused at the trial.² The Magistrate cannot, when an accused is brought before him in custody, further detain him in custody by remand without some reason made manifest to him either in the shape of sworn testimony given before him or in some other form which can be put upon the record and which is sufficient to justify him in sending the prisoner to prison there to be detained for a period not exceeding fifteen days.³ In *Emperor v Sooba*⁴ Kendall, J. of the High Court of Allahabad, observed as follows

'Two considerations that should influence the Court in deciding whether a remand should be granted are —

1 whether sufficient evidence has been obtained to raise a suspicion that the accused may have committed the offence and it appears likely that further evidence may be obtained by a remand and

2 whether the time asked by the police for the remand is in the circumstances of the case, reasonable or not "

A mere expectation that after sometime by dint of enquiry some evidence might be obtained is not a sufficient cause for remand. It is only after sufficient evidence has been obtained to raise a suspicion that the accused may have committed an offence, that a likelihood of obtaining further evidence will be a reasonable cause for remand.⁵ Where some evidence was available but it appeared to the Magistrate necessary to defer the examination so that the inquiry might be continuous a further remand was held justified.⁶ Similarly where it was proved by an affidavit that there was a conspiracy and it was also proved by sufficient evidence that the accused were members of that conspiracy, it was held that the Magistrate was justified in keeping them in custody for such period as appeared to him to be reasonable.⁷ But where the complainant and his witnesses were not validly bound over to appear and did not appear on the date of the enquiry, it was held that a detention of the accused was not justified.⁸ A remand for the purpose of getting a confession from the accused is most improper.⁹

Where after one remand the accused is brought up and a further remand is asked for some direct evidence of his guilt should be required to justify his further detention, and with each remand the necessity for producing such evidence increases.¹⁰

In the undermentioned case¹¹ it was held by the High Court of Calcutta that the language of sub s (1) shows that where the Magistrate properly directs a postponement he has unfettered discretion to remand the accused to custody. It was further held that even assuming that there must be reasonable cause not only for the order of postponement but for the order of remand, the explanation to the section describes only one type of reasonable cause and there may be reasonable cause for a remand even though the circumstances do not fall under the terms of the explanation.

19 Remand in absence of accused — A remand cannot be granted in the absence of the prisoner. As has been seen already the use of the word remand shows that a prisoner is brought up under custody and is re-committed to custody.¹

20 Period of detention — There is no limit set to the total period of a series of orders of remand under this section¹; provided no single order of remand exceeds fifteen days at a time². An accused is entitled to have the evidence against him recorded as early as possible³ and the fact that there may be a large body of evidence forthcoming against him is not a good ground for detention for an inordinate period.⁴

Where no evidence of an incriminating nature was forthcoming even after the remand for six weeks a further detention was held not justified.⁵ But in a conspiracy case where considerable time is required to collect evidence, detention for a period of three months was held good.⁶

21 "By a warrant" — A warrant for further detention of an accused should be a warrant of commitment directed to some jailor or other person having authority to receive and keep prisoners. The warrant must state that the prisoner is charged with some particular offence.¹

22 Magistrate's liability for unreasonable detention — A Magistrate who without reasonable cause and without good faith delays proceeding with the trial of persons whom he keeps in jail will be liable to an action in damages notwithstanding the Judicial Officers Protection Act 17 [XVII] of 1850.¹

Difference between the Codes of 1861 and 1872 —

The Code of 1861 contained no provision such as that found in this section and it was not settled whether there might be a compromise in a criminal case¹

Section 188 of the Code of 1872 provided that in the case of offences which may lawfully be compounded injured persons may compound the offences out of Court or in Court with the permission of the Court. What those offences were 'which may lawfully be compounded,' were not mentioned in the section for that information one had to refer to the exception to S 214 Penal Code.

Difference between the Codes of 1872 and 1882 —

Section 345 of the Code of 1882 gave a tabulated list that was intended to be exhaustive of the offences that were compoundable. The Code also for the first time, introduced a distinction between offences compoundable with the permission of the Court and those compoundable without such permission. In keeping with this amendment to the Procedure Code and almost simultaneously with it an amendment was made to S 214, Penal Code, by Act 8 [VIII] of 1882 substituting for the original exception, referred to above, the exception that now finds place in the section reading thus 'The provisions

Section 315 of the Code of 1882 gave a tabulated list that was intended to be exhaustive of the offences that were compoundable. The Code also, for the first time, introduced a distinction between offences compoundable with the permission of the Court and those compoundable without such permission. In keeping with this amendment to the Procedure Code and almost simultaneously with it, an amendment was made to S 214, Penal Code, by Act 8 (VIII) of 1882, substituting for the original exception, referred to above, the exception that now finds place in the section, reading thus : "The provisions of ss 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence may lawfully be compounded "

Changes introduced in 1898 —

Sub section (5) was newly added

Amendments introduced by Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923 —

- (1) Section 508, Penal Code, was added to the list of offences compoundable without leave of Court.
- (2) The present sub s (2) was substituted for the original sub section thus enlarging the list of offences compoundable with the leave of Court under sub s (2).
- (3) Sub-section (4) was amended by substituting the words "under the age of eighteen years or is" for the words "a minor," thus making it clear that the age of majority is eighteen years (There was a doubt regarding this before — See Note 10) The leave of the Court in the case of composition on behalf of persons under disability has also been made a necessary condition
- (4) Sub section (5A) was newly added (see Note 16)
- (5) Sub section (6) has been amended by adding the words "with whom the offence has been compounded" at the end so as to make it clear that the effect of a composition is to acquit only the accused with whom the offence has been compounded thereby setting at rest the controversy on this point also See Note 18

2. Scope and principle — The law makes a difference between various classes of offences and allows compromise in some and no compromise in others¹ Competence to accept satisfaction for wrong done to oneself which follows from the general rule of freedom of transactions is subject to limitations, those limitations corresponding generally with classes of wrongs in which, though a personal injury is sustained, a civil suit is not allowed, or is allowed only after the public interest has been satisfied In such a case, the institution of a prosecution is a duty which cannot be neglected in consideration of any private advantage²

The principle of English law is that the composition of an offence is illegal if the offence is one of public concern, but lawful if the offence is of a private nature and for which damages may be recovered in a civil action This principle was adopted in this country also, but there was, before the Code of 1892, an uncertainty as to what exactly were the cases which were compoundable³

The tabulation of offences in this section now removes all uncertainty⁴ and must be taken as a complete guide and test on the matter⁵ The policy of the Legislature adopted in this section is that in the case of certain minor offences, where the interests of the public are not vitally affected, the complainant should be permitted to come to terms with the party against whom he complains, the offences being specified in the section⁶ Where an offence with which a particular person is charged is compoundable, he is at liberty to come to a settlement with the prosecution and the settlement so arrived at cannot be considered to be one the consideration for which is illegal⁷ Where a case has

The provisions of the section are not limited to cases wherein the accused pleads guilty. Such a view would limit the scope of the section to those comparatively few cases in which the accused is advised that defence would be hopeless⁹

The section does not apply to offences punishable under laws *other than the Penal Code*¹⁰ Sub section (6) of this section does not apply to a Panchayat under Bihar and Orissa Village Administration Act, 1922, and a Panchayat is not bound to accept a compromise entered into by the parties¹¹

3 Withdrawal and composition compared — An act of compounding is different from the withdrawal of a complaint made to a Magistrate. A withdrawal must be by intimation to the Magistrate and the complainant is required to satisfy the Magistrate that there are sufficient grounds for permitting him to withdraw it¹ A withdrawal is permissible in all summons cases. Composition is only permitted in respect of specified offences some of which are summons cases and others not, the offences being mentioned in this section. Again withdrawal is the act of one party to the proceeding, viz., the complainant whereas the composition of an offence obviously requires the co operation of both parties. Permission is necessary in the case of withdrawal, because it is the act of one party alone. Complainants otherwise would be at liberty to bring frivolous and vexatious complaints and withdraw them calmly when they have caused the accused enough of annoyance and degradation. There is no such abuse of process to be guarded against in a composition it being the act of both the parties² Withdrawals are confined to summons cases warrant cases cannot be withdrawn³ A complaint can be withdrawn only by the complainant who may not necessarily be the person injured⁴ The word 'compound' means to withdraw for a consideration, and not merely to withdraw⁵ See also S 248, Note 3

Whether a petition is one for withdrawal or compromise, is to be judged from the fact whether the accused consented to it or not. The substance and not merely the form of the petition should be considered⁶ When the complainant put in a petition before the Court not asking for permission to withdraw but saying that he did withdraw against one of the accused as there had been an apology, and he wished the case to proceed only against the other accused, it was held that it was not a case of mere withdrawal but was one of

to it for determining the classes of offences which concern individuals only as distinguished from those which have reference to the interests of the State, and Courts of law cannot go beyond that test and substitute for it one of their own² It is the duty of a criminal Court to refuse to allow the withdrawal of the prosecution if the case is non compoundable³

A Magistrate should consider all the circumstances and make up his mind that only a compoundable offence is proved before he allows a compounding⁴ Where the evidence taken by a Magistrate clearly disclosed a non compoundable offence, it was held that he had no authority to allow the offence to be compounded and in doing so had usurped jurisdiction not vested in him⁵ See also the undermentioned cases⁶ The withdrawal from the prosecution in a case in which the offence charged is non compoundable has not the effect of an acquittal,⁷ and an agreement entered into between the complainant and the accused for the refund of money embezzled by the latter was not allowed to be pleaded as a bar of prosecution for the offence⁸

To determine whether a case is compoundable or not, the offence with the commission of which the accused were charged in the complaint or with which the Court charged them should be looked into⁹ Where the offence, so far as was then known, believed and alleged, was punishable under S 323, it was held that the composition was legal¹⁰ If a complaint alleges circumstances constituting a compoundable offence, as also other circumstances alleging a non compoundable offence, it has to be seen what are the essential circumstances¹¹

The question of a case being compoundable or not must be decided with reference to the state of facts existing at the date of the application to compound It is not possible for the Court to see what the ultimate result of the case will be¹² Where a Magistrate allowed the non compoundable offence of rioting to be compounded upon a mere surmise, based on no evidence, that the case might in the end turn out to be one of a compoundable offence, it was held that he had no such power¹³

compoundable offence alone, a composition may be effected¹⁴ Conversely, if in the trial of a compoundable offence, an offence which is not compoundable is by oversight mentioned in the summons, it does not deprive the parties of their right to compound¹⁵

Where a person was convicted of a non compoundable offence but on appeal was acquitted of that but the appellate Court considered that he should be convicted of a compoundable offence of which he had not been tried by the Magistrate, it was held that he should be allowed an opportunity of compounding the offence, if he could, before being convicted of the same¹⁶ Where this opportunity was not allowed, the High Court allowed it in revision¹⁷

6 Consideration — The compounding of an offence signifies that the person against whom the offence has been committed has received some gratification, not necessarily of a pecuniary character, to act as an inducement for his desiring to abstain from a prosecution¹

The composition spoken of in this section is in the nature of a contract, but monetary consideration is not necessary² It has even been suggested that a lawful composition may be effected within the scope of this section without the passing of any consideration, the only essential thing required being that some arrangement should have been arrived at between the parties, which settles their differences³ The Court is not concerned with the nature or value of the consideration If the complainant considers that his grievance is redressed by the mere fact of respectable persons having intervened, though he has received no money payment or even a direct apology from the accused, he is, nevertheless, at full liberty to compound the prosecution⁴ For instance, where a mere apology was the consideration, see the undermentioned case⁵

7. Free will is necessary. — Although the provisions of the Contract Act may not apply, the proof of the arrangement must be similar to that which a Court requires for the proof of any agreement which is in issue, and unless it appears that the parties were free from influence of every kind and were fully aware of their respective rights, it would be impossible to give effect to a so called arrangement or composition¹

8. Compoundable offences — Under s 188 of the Code of 1872, which did not give a list of compoundable offences, it was held that the test for determining whether an offence was compoundable or not was that wherever a word such as "voluntarily," "intentionally," "fraudulently," etc, was an essential part of the definition of the offence, it was not compoundable, but that where the offence was one irrespective of the intention and for which a civil action might be brought at the option of the persons injured, instead of criminal proceedings it was compoundable¹

An offence under S 143 of the Penal Code is not compoundable as it directly affects the public peace and not merely those immediately involved² The essence of an offence under S 143 is the combination of several persons united in the purpose of committing a criminal offence and such a combination in itself constitutes an offence distinct from the criminal offence which these persons agree to commit So though the law may allow the latter offence to be compounded the effect of such composition is not to annul the common object charged and the prosecution under S 143 will not fall to the ground but may be proceeded with³

The offence of rioting under S 147 of the Penal Code, being an offence against the public tranquillity primarily concerns the State more than the individual and that is probably one reason why that offence is not included by the Legislature in the category of compoundable offences⁴

The offences of extortion and fabricating false evidence are not private disputes and neither of these offences is compoundable⁵

An offence under S 24 of the Cattle trespass Act is not compoundable But where that offence was charged along with an offence under S 323, Penal Code and the parties effected a compromise in respect of the latter offence it was held that the Magistrate if he thought fit to do so was entitled to deal with the compromise as a withdrawal of the complaint in respect of the offence under the Cattle trespass Act because a case in respect of such offence being a summons-case would result in an acquittal if no evidence were adduced⁶

9. Who can compound. — Any person may set the criminal law in motion but it is only the person specified in S. 345 who can compound the offence.¹ Hence, a husband may be a complainant when the offence is defamation of his wife by the imputation of unchastity to her but it is only the wife who is entitled to compound the offence.² Similarly, in the case of the offence of abduction, though the complaint may have been preferred by another person, e g, the father of the girl in whose custody the girl may have been at the time of the abduction, still it is only the husband who is competent to compound the offence.³

The offence of hurt can be compounded only by the person to whom the hurt is caused, and neither his heirs nor any other person can compound the offence.⁴ The offence of criminal trespass can be compounded by the person in whose possession the property was,⁵ the offence of wrongful restraint by the person restrained⁶ and the offence of wrongful confinement by the person confined.⁷

But where a person sends another man to the Court to represent him in filing a complaint, the Court is perfectly justified in accepting the latter's statement that he desires to compound the offence with the assumption that he is authorized by the former to compound it, and under the circumstances, it is not incumbent on the Court, before allowing the case to be compounded and acquitting the accused, to make any inquiry into his authority.⁸

10 Minor—Sub-section (4) clearly implies that a person under eighteen years of age cannot compound an offence. Previous to the amendment of the sub-section in 1923, the word used in the section was a minor and no reference was made to the age limit. It was held that the age of majority contemplated by this section was not to be regulated by the personal law of the party concerned and that the effect of this section read with s 3 of the Indian Majority Act was that a person under eighteen years of age could not lawfully compound the offences declared to be compoundable by this section¹. This view has been given effect to by the amendment.

A husband committed the offence of hurt against his wife, a minor. She at the suggestion of her father with whom she was living, filed a complaint against her husband. It was held that the father of the girl was competent to compound the offence on her behalf². Where an offence is compounded on behalf of a minor under sub-s. (4), the permission of the Court is necessary for such composition³.

11. Composition under sub-section (1)—In cases falling under sub-s. (1), no leave of the Court is necessary for compounding¹ and in such cases the Magistrate has no option but is bound to allow the compromise². Parties are entitled to compound such offences unconditionally and when a razinama is filed by them, it is not for the Magistrate to inquire whether the complaint was frivolous or vexatious³. The mere fact that the accused has been sent up by the police does not prevent the person mentioned in the third column of the table from compounding the offence⁴.

Where the offence is compoundable by parties without the leave of the Court, and it is so compounded, and a deed of composition is filed by all the parties present in Court, the only verification necessary is to see whether the parties signed it and understood its contents, the Magistrate should not adjourn the case for verification or call for further proof of the compromise but should, without unnecessary delay, acquit the accused⁵.

Where the Court has drawn up a charge of an offence compoundable without the sanction of the Court and after this charge has been read and explained to the accused and pleaded to, a petition of composition is presented to it, the Court should at once accept the petition and acquit the accused, it has no power at that stage to alter the charge, the composition has the effect of an acquittal and is complete immediately the complainant puts it forward in Court⁶. Where a Magistrate records a compromise, he becomes functus

9. Who can compound. — Any person may set the criminal law in ; but it is only the person specified in S 345 who can compound the offence¹. If husband may be a complainant when the offence is defamation of his wife by imputation of unchastity to her but it is only the wife who is entitled to compound the offence². Similarly, in the case of the offence of abduction, though the complaint may have been preferred by another person, e.g., the father of the girl in whose custody the offence may have been at the time of the abduction, still it is only the husband who is entitled to compound the offence³.

The offence of hurt can be compounded only by the person to whom the hurt is caused, and neither his heirs nor any other person can compound the offence⁴. The offence of criminal trespass can be compounded by the person in whose possession the property was,⁵ the offence of wrongful restraint by the person restrained⁶ and the offence of wrongful confinement by the person confined⁷.

But where a person sends another man to the Court to represent him in filing a complaint, the Court is perfectly justified in accepting the latter's statement that he desires to compound the offence with the assumption that he is authorized by the former to compound it, and under the circumstances, it is not incumbent on the Court before allowing the case to be compounded and acquitting the accused, to make any inquiry into his authority⁸.

officio, and an order stating that the parties should again appear on another date is of no effect⁷

In cases falling under sub s (1) in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, the natural interpretation is that the composition is not limited to acts done in Court or to cases in which the parties continue to be of the same mind until the case comes on for further hearing before the Court⁸ So far at least as offences falling under sub s (1) are concerned there is no necessity for the composition to be effected in Court in criminal trials any more than in civil suits⁹

12 Compositions under sub section (2) — In cases governed by sub s. (2), no effect can be given to a compromise as a plea in bar of conviction unless the Court has sanctioned the compromise Without the sanction the so called compromise arrived at between the parties is of no effect The jurisdiction of the Court to try the offence is unaffected and there is no rule of law which would enable the Court in a case falling under sub s. (2) to order an enquiry into the factum of compromise alleged by one party and denied by the other¹

An agreement to compound an offence falling within this sub-section can only be effected with the Court's permission after the institution of criminal proceedings² Where an agreement to compound has been arrived at, the operation of a composition is suspended till the Court sanctions it But where the composition has been made out of Court and at a certain stage in the proceedings the Court gives its sanction thereto the composition is not bad³

The only Court which has power under s 345, sub s (2) is the Court before which the prosecution is pending⁴ A police officer is not competent to entertain an application for withdrawal of a complaint as permitting the withdrawal of a complaint is a judicial act the exercise of which is vested in the Magistrate by ss 248 and 345 and the police have no authority to interfere in such matters⁵

The judicial officer charged with the duty of determining judicially matters which come before him should himself decide the petition for withdrawal of a complaint or petition for a compromise and should not refer it to the District Magistrate or the police

In granting permission, the Court should exercise a sound and reasonable discretion. Permission is not to be granted as a matter of course.* A Magistrate is bound to consider all facts before acceding to a sanction he ought not to permit an offence to be compounded until he is satisfied that such permission may be legitimately granted.* The Magistrate should record his reasons to enable the High Court to determine if the discretion has been exercised properly.* The granting of permission under this sub-section being within the sole discretion of a Magistrate the High Court will not entertain an appeal against an order of acquittal passed under this section in the absence of proof of the grossest misuse of his discretion by a Magistrate.* Where an application for leave to compound an offence under S 325 was rejected by a Bench of Magistrates on improper grounds, the High Court on revision remanded the application to the trial Court for disposal according to S 315, sub-s. - (2) Where the offence related to public property but the matters were such as could not be suitably unravelled in a criminal case and the compromise was arrived at, at an early stage¹⁵
- (3) Where the permission was refused on the ground that petitioner was a clerk in the Collectorate and the Magistrate considered that as a serious charge had been made against him, he should clear his character¹⁶
- (4) Where parties are nearly related to one another and have succeeded in patching up their quarrels¹⁷
- (5) Where the offence is not a serious one and the compromise is arrived at, at an early stage¹⁸

On the other hand, where a compromise arrived at, at a late stage, was retracted by the complainant and one of the offences charged was a non compoundable one, it was held that the Magistrate had not acted improperly in refusing permission¹⁹

In cases falling under ss 324 and 325, all circumstances should be taken into consideration before sanctioning compromise, and the Magistrate should bear in mind that such an offence is punishable not only for the satisfaction of the person injured but for the protection of society. The degree of prevalence of such offences at a particular time and place may fitly be taken into consideration in determining whether a compromise should be allowed²⁰. Where all the circumstances were not considered, the compromise was set aside by the High Court in revision²¹

In the undermentioned case²² the allegations in the complaint were that the accused who was a clerk in the High Court had cheated the complainant by inducing him to pay a sum of money by way of bribe to be paid to the Judge of the High Court in charge of the complainant's case. The Magistrate allowed the offence to be compounded. In an appeal against the order the High Court set aside the composition on the ground that the matter was of very grave public concern.

In allowing a compromise, a Magistrate may impose a condition as to payment of some compensation to the injured man²³

The mere fact that a petition for compromise is filed in Court (but is not allowed) is no ground for the reduction of a sentence²⁴

13. Proof of composition — Where an accused person alleges that the offence of which he is charged has been compounded, the onus is on him to show that there has been a real and valid composition with the person entitled to compound¹. Before a composition can be allowed, the Court must be satisfied that it is legal and valid in law². Where a compromise is alleged by one party and denied by the other, the Magistrate must try the issue³. An order of the Magistrate, acquitting the accused without inquiry

14 Stage at which a compounding may be effected — An offence which is compoundable without the permission of the Court may be compounded even before the filing of a complaint¹ A case may be compounded at any time before judgment is pronounced² The fact that the prosecution evidence has been closed and that a charge has been framed is no bar to the composition as the offence can be compounded at any time before the passing of the sentence³ After conviction however there can be no composition except with the leave of the appellate Court⁴ Where an order is made by a District Magistrate under s 435 calling for the record and proceeding before a Magistrate with a view to withdrawing the case and transferring it to another Magistrate the jurisdiction of the former Magistrate is suspended and he is not therefore entitled to record a composition of the offence and acquit the accused though at that time the case has not actually been transferred from his file⁵

15 Composition after committal or conviction — A committal once made by a Magistrate cannot be annulled by his allowing the prosecutor to file a compromise¹ After conviction a composition can be effected only with the leave of the appellate Court²

Where an accused is tried and convicted of an offence which is compoundable but on appeal the conviction is set aside and a re trial ordered it is open to the complainant and accused to compound the case in the same manner as they might have done prior to the conviction and no leave of the appellate Court is necessary³

cation to compound an offence under S 325 Penal Code is rejected by the trial Court and in appeal from conviction the appellate Court while writing the judgment finds that an offence compoundable under sub s (1) has been committed, it can consider an application for compounding and then pass an order allowing the offence to be compounded and the consequential order of acquittal^o

16 High Court's powers in revision — Before the introduction of sub s (5A) by Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923 divergent views were held as to whether a High Court had power to apply the powers granted in S 345 to cases in revision, some cases holding that the High Court had no such power¹ and other cases taking the opposite view² The introduction of sub s (5A) leaves the position free from doubt and explicitly confers on the High Court acting in the exercise of its powers of revision under S 439 power to allow any person to compound offences which may lawfully be compounded³ One of the objects of the Legislature in enacting sub s (5A) was in suitable circumstances to allow the parties to compromise their disputes even after the cases in which they were concerned had been heard and determined by the Courts competent to try them⁴ But the sub-section should be interpreted very strictly and the discretion conferred upon the High Court should be exercised very sparingly and only in suitable cases⁵ The sub section has to be read subject to the preceding subsections of S 345 especially sub ss (1) and (2) and so read it is clear that sub s (5A) merely confers jurisdiction on the High Court in the exercise of its powers of revision under S 439 to allow the aggrieved persons mentioned in column three of the tables attached to subsections (1) and (2) to compound the various offences

Appellate Court can allow offence to be compounded — Quest on of reduction of offence under S 325 to S 323 taking effect only on pronouncement of judgment is immaterial)

mentioned in those sub sections. Thus, it would follow that ordinarily the party who seeks to invoke the jurisdiction of the High Court under sub s (5A) must be the person aggrieved by the offence which has been committed and not an accused person or a person who has been convicted in respect of that offence⁶

It will not be competent for the High Court to allow a compromise to be recorded under sub s (5A) unless the aggrieved persons were actually before the High Court and had expressly recorded their consent to such a compromise being recorded⁷

It has also been held that where the proceedings before the lower Courts disclose no irregularity or impropriety the exceptional power conferred on the High Court under sub-s (5A) should not ordinarily be used except in a case in which the record indicates that the parties made some attempt to compromise their differences while the matter was still before the trial Court and before that Court passed final orders in the case⁸

17 Rescission of compromise — A composition once effected cannot be withdrawn¹ It is entirely immaterial whether the terms of the compromise have been carried out or not, the sole question being whether there was a composition or not a breach of the agreement might give rise to other remedies² Since the compromise has the immediate effect of acquittal (see Note 18) so as to deprive the Magistrate of his jurisdiction to try the case the subsequent withdrawal from it by any party can neither affect the acquittal nor revive the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to proceed with the case³

18 Effect of compromise — When a case is compounded it results not merely in a discharge but in an acquittal and until such order of acquittal is properly set aside, the accused cannot be prosecuted again for the same offence¹ or for any other offence (which is not distinct) for which a different charge from that which was compounded might have been framed on the same facts² Where at the time of compromise of the offence it was believed that the offence fell under S 323 it was held that the discovery later that it fell under S 325 would not enable the Magistrate to re open the prosecution for that offence³ The composition of one offence will not however bar a prosecution for

If a non compoundable case is dismissed on the parties coming to an amicable settlement the dismissal does not amount to an acquittal but only to a discharge and does not bar the revival of the prosecution¹⁰ Where an order of acquittal has been passed on an invalid composition, it may be set aside in revision¹¹ A Magistrate is not competent to award compensation to the accused where an offence is compounded under s 345¹² The reason is that s 250 only applies where the Magistrate discharges or acquits the accused whereas under this section the acquittal takes place automatically on the composition of an offence. But though the Magistrate cannot allow compensation if the complaint is wholly false he may consider whether a criminal prosecution for making a false complaint is desirable in the interests of justice.¹³ In the case of a dispute between two brothers wherein the prosecution for theft was found to be false it was held that the parties being brothers the prosecution of the complainant under S 192 should not have been instituted.¹⁴

If a case is compounded the composition does not prevent the complainant being charged under S 211 if the complaint was false.¹⁵

Where a compromise has been entered into orders passed in connexion with the compromise by the Magistrate before whom the case was pending must be deemed to have been passed by him in his judicial capacity.¹⁶

Where an offence under S 324 Penal Code committed by a person who has executed a security bond under S 107 to keep the peace is compounded the composition has the effect of acquittal of the accused and unless there is any other evidence on the record to show that he committed the breach of the peace the bond cannot be forfeited.¹⁷

Sub section (6) does not contemplate the passing of an actual order of acquittal though in fact such orders are frequently passed. The words 'shall have the effect of an acquittal' imply that all the incidents attaching to an actual order of acquittal including a right of appeal will be brought into operation. Thus an order according sanction under S 345 (2) will be appealable under S 417 by virtue of this sub section.¹⁸

19 Sub section (7) — The provisions of sub s (-) seem to be perfectly general and govern the composition of offences whether any steps have been taken or not to prosecute the offender.¹

Section 345 contains provisions with regard to (a) persons who may compound (b) the nature of offences which may be compounded (c) the stage at which composition is sought to be made and (d) permission of Court in certain cases. Sub section (7) must be taken to mean that no offences shall be compounded except where the provisions of S 345 are satisfied as to all these matters.²

20 Civil suit — Where the offences were compoundable and the complainant had already sued the accused on the same cause of action and obtained adequate damages it was held that in the circumstances of the case it was not necessary in the ends of justice that he should again be put to trial in a criminal Court for the same offence.¹ The effect of the compounding of an offence which is compoundable apart from the acquittal of the accused would be that a suit for damages on the facts constituting the original offence would not lie.²

21. Procedure in non-compoundable cases where injured party declines to prosecute.—Once the criminal law is set in motion by the issue of process in a non compoundable case, the Magistrate must require the complainant to carry his prosecution through to the end¹ The Legislature has not left it to the will of a Magistrate to proceed or not, as he thinks fit, with cases which cannot be legally compounded. It requires him, when once the complaint for such an offence is before him, to make a complete inquiry and to see that the accused who is guilty is brought to punishment²

In non-compoundable cases, once action has been taken the case will normally proceed and it is nowhere provided that a desire on the part of the complainant to refrain from further pursuing the case shall justify the arrest of further proceedings. The final responsibility of such cases, whether instituted on complaint or otherwise, rests with the State³

346.* (1) If, in the course of an inquiry or a trial before a Magistrate in any district outside the presidency-towns, the evidence appears to him to warrant a presumption that the case is one which should be tried or committed for trial by some other Magistrate in such district, he shall stay proceedings and submit the case, with a brief report explaining its nature, to any Magistrate to whom he is subordinate or to such other Magistrate, having jurisdiction, as the District Magistrate directs.

(2) The Magistrate to whom the case is submitted may, if so empowered, either try the case himself, or refer it to any Magistrate subordinate to him having jurisdiction, or commit the accused for trial.

1 Legislative changes

Difference between the Codes of 1861 and 1872 —

- (1) Section 276 of the Code of 1861 contemplated reference only by a "subordinate Magistrate". The subsequent Codes have omitted the qualifying word "subordinate," so that now a reference may be made by any Magistrate
- (2) Under the Code of 1861 a submission of a case could be made only to the Magistrate to whom the Magistrate submitting the same was subordinate. From the Code of 1872 onwards the section has been altered so as to allow a reference to 'such other Magistrate having jurisdiction, as the Magistrate of the district (District Magistrate) directs'
- (3) There was a specific provision in the Code of 1861 requiring that the Magistrate to whom a case was submitted, or the officer subordinate to him, to whom it may be referred, shall examine the parties and witnesses and proceed in all respects as if no proceedings had been held in any other Court. The later Codes have omitted this specific provision. As to the effect of this, see Note 5

- (1) Both the Codes of 1861 and 1872 restricted the application of the section to cases which the Magistrate was not competent to try or commit for trial. Section 346 of the Code of 1882 and the present section have removed such restriction. See Note 2
- (2) Section 45 of the Code of 1872 applied even to Magistrates within the presidency-towns. The Codes of 1882 and 1898 have restricted the application of the section to trials before Magistrates outside the presidency towns

2 Scope and applicability of the section. — This section enacts the procedure to be followed by Provincial Magistrates where, in the course of an enquiry or a trial, the evidence appears to warrant a presumption that the case is one —

- (1) which should be tried by some other Magistrate in the district, or
- (2) which should be committed for trial by some other Magistrate in the district

The words "should be tried or committed for trial by some other Magistrate" do not necessarily mean that the Magistrate who is to take action under this section has no jurisdiction to try the case himself. Even if he has such jurisdiction he may still be of opinion that it "should be tried" by some other Magistrate on grounds such as complexity of facts, convenience of parties etc.¹

Section 346 — Note 2

1 (94) 1894 All W N 200 (200) Empress v Chandra Ballab Joshi (In this case, the fact that the accused had previous convictions on account of which he would be liable for enhanced punishment in the event of conviction was held sufficient ground for referring the case under this section — It should be presumed that this was not a case which came within the terms of S 343)

... .. hat the
... .. award
... .. must be noted that this does not seem to be a case under S 349, as the Magistrate's action was apparently not taken after taking the evidence for the prosecution and the accused as required by that section)

The provisions of this section should be construed so as not to overlap or conflict with ss 347, 348 and 349 which are specific provisions providing for particular classes of cases. Where therefore, a case falls under S 347, S 348 or S 349 the Court should only act under that section and not under S 346. Thus where a person is accused of an offence punishable with imprisonment for three years or upwards under Ch XII or Ch XVII of the Penal Code and by reason of previous convictions for similar offences would be liable for enhanced punishment in the event of his conviction for the present offence the proper procedure is under S 348 and this section is irrelevant in this connexion³. Similarly, where the Magistrate is of opinion that the case is one which ought to be tried by a Court of Session and he is himself empowered to commit the same to such Court he should act under S 347 and not under this section⁴.

This section is not inapplicable to cases where the accused is a European British subject⁴.

It has been held that where a complaint is presented to a Magistrate not having territorial jurisdiction to inquire into or try the offence the proper procedure is to return the complaint for presentation to the proper Court and not to submit the papers to a superior Magistrate under this section⁵.

3 Duty of the inferior Courts — A Magistrate who finds that he has no jurisdiction to try a case cannot discharge an accused on that ground but should proceed under this section¹. Nor can he clutch at jurisdiction by trying the accused for such offences only as he is competent to try even though other offences are disclosed during the trial which he is not competent to try². Where therefore in the course of a trial for an offence which he is competent to try the evidence discloses also an offence beyond his jurisdiction he cannot ignore the latter and try the accused for the former offence only³. Similarly where the evidence discloses circumstances of aggravation which make the offence cognizable by a higher Court he cannot ignore such circumstances and try the accused for the minor offence only⁴. Where however, the graver offence disclosed was one for the trial of which sanction was necessary to be obtained, and such sanction had been refused it was held that the trial for the lesser offence was not incompetent⁵

But the fact that the Magistrate ignores the circumstances disclosing a graver offence for which he is not competent to try, and tries for the lesser offence, will not render the proceeding void, the reason being that the Magistrate is competent to try for the lesser offence⁶. The proceedings, therefore, will not be quashed where the accused is not prejudiced by such procedure and the sentence is not inadequate⁷.

A Magistrate is at liberty to stay proceedings at any time during the inquiry and submit it to the Magistrate to whom he is subordinate⁸.

This section requires that when in the course of an inquiry or trial it is found that the offence is beyond the competence of the Magistrate to try or inquire into, the latter should stay the proceeding and refer it to a superior Magistrate. A fortiori, where even at the outset, the offence disclosed on the allegations is beyond his competence to try or inquire into, he cannot ignore aggravating circumstances and proceed in respect of such offence as is within his jurisdiction.⁹

The provisions of this section imply, however, that a subordinate Magistrate can legally enquire into a serious offence up to the stage at which the question of charge or discharge has to be decided. The mere fact, therefore, that in order to make his case more serious a complainant alleges the commission of an offence which could not be tried by a junior Magistrate will not render the proceedings of that Magistrate illegal if he goes on to try that case and decide it holding that the facts disclosed show that it is the lesser offence which he is competent to try.¹⁰

See also section 28, Note 1 and section 207, Note 3.

Where the trying Magistrate finds that the offence disclosed can only be tried by a Magistrate of a higher class, an order of the District Magistrate cannot confer jurisdiction on him.¹¹

4. To whom the case should be submitted. — A Magistrate may submit a case under this section to —

- (1) any Magistrate to whom he is subordinate,¹ or
- (2) such other Magistrate as the District Magistrate directs.

In either case it is essential that the Magistrate to whom the case is submitted should be one having jurisdiction over it.²

Pending inquiry into a charge of house breaking, the second class Magistrate of B division was transferred to A division. The case was, therefore, transferred to his file by the District Magistrate. In the course of inquiry the second class Magistrate found that the offence committed was robbery which was not triable by him and therefore he submitted the case to the Sub divisional Magistrate of A. It was held that the order of the District Magistrate transferring the case to the second class Magistrate at A did not give any jurisdiction to the Sub divisional Magistrate of A over the case (which arose in the territorial jurisdiction of the Court at B) and that the submission being thus not to a Magistrate "having jurisdiction" was bad.³

5. Trial must be de novo—Sub-section (2). — It is a general principle of criminal law that it is only an authority who has heard all the evidence that is competent to decide whether the accused is innocent or guilty.¹ The Criminal Procedure Code has, however made exceptions to this general rule in ss 349 and 350. The exception enacted in the latter section is almost a general rule by itself in that it provides that whenever any Magistrate ceases to exercise jurisdiction in a case and is succeeded by another (and under sub s (3)—this applies to cases transferred from one Magistrate to another), the latter can act on the evidence recorded by his predecessor but the accused can claim a trial de novo and the High Court or the District Magistrate as the case may be may also where the accused has been prejudiced by a conviction on such evidence order a new trial or inquiry. Sub section (2) of that section expressly excepts proceedings under this section from the operation thereof. The reason is that s 350 contemplates cases where at the time the evidence is recorded the Magistrate recording it has jurisdiction to do so while in cases of submission under this section on the ground that the Magistrate is not competent to try the case the evidence is recorded by a Magistrate who is not competent to try the case.³

The general principle of law namely that a Magistrate cannot decide a case who has not heard all the evidence therefore applies to proceedings under this section and consequently the Magistrate to whom a case is submitted under sub s (1) of this section cannot act on the evidence recorded by the submitting Magistrate but must if he tries the case try it de novo.⁴ If he refers the case to a subordinate Magistrate for trial the latter must also on the same principle, try it de novo.⁵ The accused has no power to waive his right to such a trial.⁶

As regards the power of the superior Magistrate acting under sub s (2) to commit the case to the sessions acting on the evidence recorded by the submitting Magistrate it has been held that such a procedure is not illegal.⁷ No reasons have been given for such a view but it may be supported on the ground that the general rule prohibits only decisions by Magistrates who have not heard all the evidence and that in committing the accused, there is no decision of the case.⁸ The High Court of Bombay has also held that such commitment is not illegal.⁹ But the reason given therefor based on the assumption that s. 230 applies but that only the proviso thereto does not apply to determinations under sub-s. (2) of this section is obviously incorrect in view of sub-s. (2) of s. 230 which clearly enacts that nothing in this section applies to cases in which proceedings have been stayed under section 246.

6 Sub section (2) — Reference to any sub Magistrate having jurisdiction — Where a Sub-divisional Magistrate in Burma proceeding under sub-s. (2) of this section transferred a case for trial to the township Magistrate of the office having been committed in the township of B it was held that there was nothing illegal in doing so inasmuch as a township is not recognized by the Code as a local area for purposes of territorial jurisdiction and under s. 10 sub-s. (2), except as otherwise provided the jurisdiction and powers of Magistrate extend throughout the district in which they are appointed.¹

It has been held by a Full Bench of the High Court of Madras² that the Magistrate to whom proceedings are submitted under this section can in a proper case refer the case back to the very Magistrate who made the submission. In this case eight persons were accused before a second class Magistrate of having committed dacoity and one of them the fifth accused was alleged to have been armed with a deadly weapon. The Magistrate acting under sub-s. (1) of this section submitted the proceedings to the Magistrate to whom he was subordinate. The latter went into the case and finding that there was no case against the fifth accused who was the only person charged with having a deadly weapon dismissed the complaint against him and referred the case back to the Magistrate who made the submission so far as the other accused were concerned. It was held that he was not incompetent to do so.

This view has however been dissented from in the undermentioned case³ of the Bombay High Court. It is there held that the words "Any Magistrate subordinate to him" mean a Magistrate other than the one who made the reference or report and competent to deal with the case as submitted. The superior Magistrate to whom a case is submitted cannot according to this view refer the case back to the very subordinate Magistrate who has reported the case.

A District Magistrate is not competent to cancel or set aside an order of a Sub-divisional Magistrate transferring a case referred to him under this section.⁴

7 Commitment to sessions. — See Note 5.

8 "Inquiry," "evidence," meaning of — The word inquiry is not restricted to proceedings after the Magistrate himself begins to take evidence. Nor is the word evidence restricted to evidence taken by the Magistrate himself. Where a Magistrate directs an inquiry by the police or another person under s. 207 he does so in the course of his own inquiry and all fact and statement disclosed by such inquiry including the report by the police or other person are evidence on which a Magistrate can act under this section.¹

1. Legislative changes. — Section 256 of the Code of 1861 and s 221 of the Code of 1872 which correspond to s 347 of the present Code found a place in the chapter relating to the trial of warrant cases, and the wording of these was such as to make them seem to be confined to "trial"

The Code of 1882 for the first time removed the section to the chapter dealing with general provisions as to inquiries and trials and by the insertion of the words, "in any inquiry" made it clear that the section applied not only to trials but also to inquiries. The reason for the change was possibly that according to some decisions a trial of a warrant-case did not begin till the accused had been charged and his plea taken, and in order to avoid all possible question as to the applicability of the provision to any stage of the proceedings before a Magistrate the Legislature inserted the words "in any inquiry."¹

The corresponding sections of the Codes of 1861 and 1872 provided that the Magistrate shall stop further proceedings "under this chapter" (namely the chapter relating to trial of warrant cases) and commit under the provisions "hereinbefore contained." With the removal of the section from the chapter relating to trial of warrant cases and its insertion in its present place, the reference to the chapter became inappropriate and was therefore, omitted in the Code of 1882. But it has been held that the omission was not intended to make any difference or to dispense with obligation of the Magistrate to follow the provisions of chap XVIII, the words "stop further proceedings" meaning only proceedings in the trial or enquiry in which the Magistrate is engaged.²

The Code of 1872 restricted the discretion of the Magistrate to such cases as the Magistrate could not or ought not to make over to a Magistrate specially empowered under s 36. This restriction has been removed by the Code of 1882.

The Code of 1898 has made no change in the section.

The words "stop further proceedings and" after the words "he shall" in sub-s. (1) have been omitted by the amending Act 18 (XVIII) of 1923 and the ~~omitting sets at rest~~ the conflict as to whether the section is or is not subject to the provisions of ~~chap. XVIII~~.³

2. Scope. — This section is supplementary to Chap XVIII and refers to a case which a Magistrate has first taken up with a view to disposing it himself, but which, he later finds is one which ought to be tried by the Court of Session or the High Court. This section lays down the procedure to be followed when such a position arises¹

The section does not apply to a case where a Magistrate thinks from the first that the case ought to be tried by the Court of Session. In such a case the Magistrate must conform to the provisions of S 208 from the start²

In the application of this section there is no distinction made between summons and warrant cases³

Sections 346, 347 and 349 — A Magistrate taking up a case may try it himself if he has jurisdiction, or he may, if he thinks he cannot inflict an adequate sentence, act under S 346 or S 349 and send it to a higher Magistrate, or he may, if he thinks that it is a proper case for a Court of Session, commit the accused under S 347, or if he has no power to commit, send it under S 346 to another Magistrate for the purpose of commitment⁴

3 "Before signing judgment" — A Magistrate has power at any stage of the proceedings to decide that the case is one which he ought not to try and which ought to be committed to sessions¹. The discretion given to him by this section is not taken away even though a charge may have been drawn up² or because the Magistrate has issued summons to the defence witnesses³. In a case where the Magistrate had as yet passed no order of discharge, he was held competent to commit to sessions⁴. But once judgment is pronounced, the Magistrate cannot commit the case to the sessions because S 403 would be a bar to further proceedings as was held in the undermentioned case⁵ decided with reference to S 348 and, as S 369 prevents a Court from altering or reviewing its judgment after it has signed it, except where such review or alteration is specially provided for⁶

4 "Ought to be tried." — If the evidence discloses an offence triable only by a Sessions Court, the Magistrate must commit the case to the sessions¹. But where the evidence discloses both an offence exclusively triable by a Sessions Court and an offence which the Magistrate himself can try, a trial and conviction by the Magistrate in respect of the latter offence is not illegal²

If the offence is one which is not exclusively triable by a Court of Session the Magistrate can commit the accused to the Court of Session only if he be of opinion that the case is one which ought to be tried by that Court³ The Magistrate must use his discretion in determining whether a particular case should be committed or not⁴ and every circumstance of aggravation must be carefully weighed⁵ The discretion given to the Magistrate by this section being a judicial one, it should be exercised with care and on some proper ground The order of committal being a judicial order the Magistrate should state his grounds for committing in order to enable the Court of Session or the High Court to judge whether the committal is a sound exercise of discretionary power⁶ The reasons given should be not only for not discharging the accused but also for committing him to Sessions Court when the case is not exclusively triable by the latter⁷ Failure to give reasons for committal as required by S 213 may be only an irregularity where the case is one which plainly ought to be tried by Sessions Court, but where it is not exclusively triable by Sessions Court the failure amounts to an illegality⁸ If no reasons are given or if the reasons given are bad in law the committal may be quashed⁹

There is a conflict of opinions as to whether the only grounds on which a Magistrate could commit are want of jurisdiction in himself, or his inability to punish adequately Decisions which have been in favour of restricting the discretion of the Magistrate to these two grounds are based on the view that S 347 is controlled by S 254 which lays down that in the trial of a warrant case where there is ground for presuming that the accused has committed an offence which the Magistrate is competent to try and which in his opinion could be adequately punished by him he shall frame a charge against the accused¹⁰ The opposite view is that S 347 is not controlled by S 251 and that want of jurisdiction in the Magistrate or his inability to punish adequately are not the only grounds on which he may commit a case to the sessions, the section is wide enough to include other grounds.¹¹ Thus a Magistrate though having power to try the case himself, may commit it to sessions if he thinks the gravity of the case requires that it be tried by such Court¹²

There is nothing anywhere which compels a Magistrate to frame that charge which on the most heinous view of the circumstances indicated by the evidence, is the gravest possible charge. It is left to the Magistrate to take a broad and commonsense view of the facts and determine whether the correct charge to be framed is or is not one which necessitates a trial by a Court of Session.¹³ A committal made under a misapprehension of the correct offence may be quashed.¹⁴ On the other hand, a Magistrate should not ignore aggravating circumstances and himself try a case which, taking a reasonable view of the depositions must be regarded as involving the trial of the accused for a grave offence¹⁵ or one in which complicated or difficult questions of law or fact arise which he is neither by training nor experience qualified to try.¹⁶

To decide whether he shall or shall not commit the case to the Court of Session, a Magistrate has to consider the gravity of the offence, the punishment with which, in his opinion it ought to be met and the section under which he charges the accused person. He may also consider special difficulties in the case or its peculiar importance and other matters might enter into his consideration.¹⁷

If a committal would result in an unwarrantable waste of time without advantage to anybody and the Magistrate is competent to try the case, he acts properly in not committing³¹

It has been held in the undermentioned cases³² that where an offender appears to be deserving of a greater punishment than the Magistrate can inflict, he should commit the case. On the other hand it has been pointed out that where the sub Magistrate has no jurisdiction but the District Magistrate has, the former would be well advised to submit the case to the latter rather than to commit, so that the valuable time of the Sessions Court may be saved³³. When two or more persons are jointly indicted and the jurisdiction of the Magistrate is ousted in the case of one of them, the proper course is to commit both or all for trial before a Court of Session³⁴.

The committal to sessions of a case which ought to have been tried by the Magistrate himself does not affect the jurisdiction of the Sessions Court to try the case and the conviction of the accused by the Sessions Court cannot be impeached as being one by a Court without jurisdiction³⁵.

5 "Under the provisions hereinbefore contained"—Before the amendment of this section it contained the words 'stop further proceedings'. These words gave rise to a conflict of opinions, one view being that they permitted the Magistrate to disregard the provisions of Chapter XVIII and commit the case to sessions immediately he formed the opinion that the case should be committed,¹ the other view was that s 347 did not in any way override the provisions of Chapter XVIII or dispense with the obligation of following them and that the words 'stop further proceedings' meant to stop proceeding with the case as a trial and to proceed to commit to sessions². The conflict has been set at rest in favour of the latter view by the omission of the words in question³. It is, therefore settled

(3) The fact that in respect of the same transaction another party of accused is being tried by sessions,²⁰ or that the facts constituting the offence form part of the same transaction with another offence triable by sessions²¹ The Lahore High Court has, however, held in the undermentioned cases²² that an apparent connexion of one case with another is no ground for committal. The Madras High Court has also held that while the fact that some connected matter is already before the Court of Session may be a good ground for committing a case to the sessions,²³ it is not an absolute rule that all charges and counter charges must be tried by the same Court²⁴. The Bombay High Court also has held that the fact that a case is connected with another which has been committed to the sessions is no ground for committal when the connexion between the two cases is not such as would embarrass or prejudice the accused in the absence of such commitment²⁵.

The following have been held not to be sufficient grounds for committal

- (1) The mere wish of parties²⁶ or the fact that the accused wants to have the benefit of a trial by jury²⁷
- (2) The mere fact that the case has caused a sensation in a particular community²⁸
- (3) The terms of a Government resolution²⁹

If a committal would result in an unwarrantable waste of time without advantage to anybody and the Magistrate is competent to try the case he acts properly in not committing³¹

It has been held in the undermentioned cases³² that where an offender appears to be deserving of a greater punishment than the Magistrate can inflict he should commit the case. On the other hand it has been pointed out that where the sub Magistrate has no jurisdiction but the District Magistrate has, the former would be well advised to submit the case to the latter rather than to commit so that the valuable time of the Sessions Court may be saved³³. law now, that this section is controlled by the provisions contained in Chapter XVIII⁴ The Magistrate must, therefore follow the procedure in Chapter XVIII, for, it can scarcely be disputed that the words 'under the provisions hereinbefore contained' must relate to the provisions in Chapter XVIII which define the procedure to be followed in inquiries into cases triable by sessions⁵

The Magistrate need not however, recommence the inquiry or take evidence de novo. It is only required that the further proceedings necessary for commitment shall be taken as directed in Chapter XVIII⁶ From the moment the Magistrate decides to commit what has hitherto been a trial becomes an enquiry under Chapter XVIII⁷ The charge already framed must be set aside in order that the Magistrate may get back to the stage at which preliminary case proceedings may be applied⁸

But it is only in respect of the offence for which the accused is to be committed that the proceedings are taken out of Chapter XVI. The other proceedings must remain covered by that chapter. So where a Magistrate, having taken cognizance of a case, frames charges comes to the conclusion that so far as one of the charges is concerned the accused should be committed and as regards the other, the offence is not proved, he is entitled under S 317 to commit for the former charge but this does not affect his obligation to acquit the accused of the latter charge⁹

Though the Magistrate need not commence proceedings de novo, once he decides to commit he must not deprive the accused of any right which he might have exercised under Chapter XVIII, had the case been treated from the outset as a preliminary enquiry¹⁰ Where the accused has had no opportunity of adducing evidence before the committal, the committal should be quashed¹¹ Also where the evidence had not been read over to the witnesses as required by S 203 read with S 360, it was held that it was not a mere formal omission but one that may deprive the accused of the valuable right to contradict the witnesses during the sessions trial by reference to their prior statements¹²

After the Magistrate has decided to commit the case, is the accused entitled to cross examine the witnesses? If the accused has cross examined the witnesses before the

Magistrate decides to commit, he has no further right of cross examination after the charge is amended. For, the amended charge is framed under S 210 which does not allow the accused the right of further cross examination.¹³ In the undermentioned case,¹⁴ during the examination of the first witness for the prosecution the Magistrate intimated to the accused his intention of committing him to a Court of Session but the accused declined to cross examine the witnesses and after the charge was framed he prayed that he might be allowed to do so, it was held that he was not entitled to do so. But it is surmised that if the accused, though having had the opportunity to cross examine does not avail himself of it because the enquiry having been originally under Chapter XXI, he was led to believe that he would have the right of cross examination after the charge is framed, the accused should not be prejudiced by the conversion of the trial into a preliminary enquiry and should be afforded an opportunity of cross examination.¹⁵ When the application to cross-examine is made before the Magistrate frames a charge and decides to commit the case, it must of course be granted.¹⁶ In the undermentioned case¹⁷ it was held that the accused would be allowed to cross examine the witnesses if his application was made before the prosecution closed its case, but not if the application was made after. Referring to this decision, however, a Calcutta case has held that such a distinction did not exist.¹⁸

In order that a committal may be quashed on the ground that the provisions of Chapter XVIII have not been followed, it must be shown that the accused has been prejudiced by the irregularity.¹⁹ But before the committal, the accused is entitled to claim that provisions relating to enquiries before the commitment shall be observed irrespective of any question as to prejudice.²⁰

Since the effect of the Magistrate's decision to commit is to convert the proceedings into a preliminary enquiry, it follows that if there be a change of Magistrates before the actual committal, the accused will not be entitled to a de novo enquiry as proviso (a) of S 350 (1) applies only to trials and not to enquiries.²¹

1 Legislative changes — The following changes were made in the section by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923

- (1) The section was re numbered as sub s (1) and the words if the Magistrate before whom committing the accused were inserted in it The amendment has been made on the lines of s 209¹
- (2) In the same sub section the words is competent to try the case and have been substituted for the words before whom the proceedings are pending in order to make it clear that the section does not empower the Magistrate to pass a sentence in a case which he is not competent to try²
- (3) The words any Magistrate in the district in the proviso to the same sub section have been substituted for the words the District Magistrate By reason of the amendment a case of an old offender may now be transferred not only to a District Magistrate empowered under s 30 but also to any other Magistrate in the district specially empowered under that section
- (4) Sub section (2) is new

2 Scope of the section — Section 30 of the Penal Code provides for enhanced punishment or punishment of a different kind for offences under chapter XII (offences relating to coin or Government stamp) and chapter XVII (offences against property) of the said Code where the accused has been previously convicted for a similar offence There are also local or special laws which provide for enhanced punishment or punishment of a different kind on a second conviction for certain classes of offences specified therein See for an illustration s 23 of the Criminal Tribes Act (6 [VI] of 1924)

Section 348—Note 1

- 1 Select Committee Report of 1916 clause 80
- 2 Select Committee Report of 1922 clause 90

This section specifies the tribunal to which old offenders in respect of the offences specified should be sent for trial by the Magistrates before whom they are charged. The object underlying the section is that the accused should be tried by a tribunal which could award him a punishment adequate to the circumstances of his case.

In order that this section may apply —

- (1) both the offences, namely, that for which the accused has been previously convicted and that for which he is being tried, must fall under one or other of the two chapters, namely, chapter XII or chapter XVII of the Penal Code, and
- (2) both must have been offences punishable with imprisonment for a term of three years or upwards.

The above conditions are the same as those necessary for the applicability of S 75¹ of the Penal Code and the cases bearing on the latter section have therefore been referred to in the following notes as an aid to the interpretation of this section.

3. Previous conviction should have been under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of the Penal Code — As has been seen in Note 2 above, the previous conviction should have been one for an offence under chapter XII or chapter XVII of the Penal Code¹. From this the following propositions follow.

- (1) An attempt (to commit an offence) punishable under S 511 of the Penal Code not being an offence under chapter XII or chapter XVII of the Penal Code, a previous conviction therefor will not count for the purposes of this section². Conversely, no previous conviction under chapter XII or chapter XVII of the Code can be reckoned against an accused when the subsequent offence with which he is charged is an attempt punishable under section 511³.
- (2) A previous conviction under any local or special law is not a conviction for an offence under the Penal Code and will not count for the purposes of this

Note 2

1. Section 75 of the Penal Code is given below for facility of reference.

'75 Whoever, having been convicted,—

Enhanced punishment for certain offences under Ch XII or Ch XVII after previous conviction (a) by a Court in British India, of an offence punishable under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of this Code with imprisonment of either description for a term of three years or upwards, or

(b) by a Court or tribunal in any Indian State acting under the general or special authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative, of an offence which would if committed in British India have been punishable under those Chapters of this Code with like imprisonment for the like term, shall be guilty of any offence punishable under either of those Chapters with like imprisonment for the like term shall be subject for every such subsequent offence to transportation for life, or to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years."

section 4 The Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court has, however, held that where an offender is dealt with under a special law which provides that certain offences punishable under the Penal Code are punishable under that law, S 75 of the Penal Code will apply.⁵ See also the undermentioned cases⁶

- (9) A previous conviction given before the Penal Code came into force cannot be taken into account for the purposes of this section⁷

4 "Having been convicted"—The words 'having been convicted' shall be guilty of any offence in S 75 of the Penal Code have been held to imply that the previous conviction should have been before the commission of the offence with which the accused is subsequently charged¹ The reason is that a man should be treated as an old offender only if it can be shown that the first conviction had no effect on him. It cannot be said that the first conviction had no effect in a case where such conviction was after the commission of the offence for which the accused is subsequently tried² This section uses the words is again accused of any offence etc, but it is conceived that the said principle will equally apply to the interpretation of this section also. Consequently, this section will not apply unless the offence with which a person is "again accused" was committed after the previous convictions³ Under S 75 of the Penal Code the previous conviction must have been by a Court in British India or by a Court or tribunal, in any Indian State acting under the general or special authority of the Central Government or of the Crown Representative. A conviction by a Court in a Native State, not acting under any such authority cannot be reckoned for the purposes of that section⁴ See also the undermen

5 "Punishable under . . . of the Indian Penal Code" — It is to be noted that for the application of this section it is not necessary that the previous sentence should have been three years or upwards, it is sufficient that the offence of which the accused was convicted is punishable under the Penal Code with imprisonment for three years or more. See also Note 3 above.

6 "For a term of three years or upwards" — Where the subsequent offence though falling under Chapter XII or Chapter XVII of the Penal Code, is punishable with imprisonment for less than three years (e.g. Section 403, Penal Code), this section will not apply.¹

7 "Shall be committed" — It is the duty of the Magistrate to commit the accused to the Sessions Court or the High Court as the case may be, if the conditions of the section are satisfied.^{1 1 2}

- (1) that the accused has been previously convicted of an offence of the kind referred to in the section,
- (2) that the Magistrate is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for committing the accused and
- (3) that the Magistrate is either not competent to try the case or is of opinion that he cannot himself pass an adequate sentence if the accused is convicted.

The prosecution and the Magistrate should, therefore, ascertain and take notice of any circumstances showing that the accused is a habitual offender who ought, under this section to be committed.² For this purpose, the Magistrate must either as a preliminary matter or at any rate before framing a charge, determine whether there has been a previous conviction having decided that point, he will have to consider whether, in the circumstances of the case, his powers enable him to pass a sufficiently severe sentence. If they do not so permit but the evidence does not warrant the discharge of the accused, he must frame a charge under s 210 and commit him for trial under Chapter XVIII of the Code.³ When an old convict for theft is again found prowling about at night and seems to be again under these circumstances guilty of stealing he has created against himself a presumption of criminal habit which, if un rebutted, would justify a Magistrate in applying ordinarily the rule of this section.⁴

The fact that the property stolen was small in value is no reason by itself for not committing the accused and for passing a small sentence on him⁵ On the other hand the Court should as was held by Macleod C J, in King Emperor v Gala Mana,⁶ exercise a wise discretion in making the penalty fit the crime and should not ordinarily consider petty offenders liable to such heavy punishment as to necessitate their committal to the Court of Session Thus it has been held that the lapse of a long time since the previous conviction together with the fact that the accused has been leading a blameless life in the interval will make the application of S 75 Penal Code inappropriate⁷ See also the under mentioned case⁸

Old offenders should ordinarily be charged before first class Magistrates to enable adequate sentences being passed without the necessity of always committing the accused to the Court of Session or the High Court⁶

1 Legislative changes

Changes introduced in the Code of 1872—

- (1) For the words 'subordinate Magistrate' occurring in the Code of 1872 (s. 277) the words 'Magistrate of the second or third class' were substituted
- (2) The words 'shall record the finding and submit his proceedings' were altered into 'may record the finding and if sentence has not been passed, may submit his proceedings'
- (3) The words 'forward the accused' were newly added
- (4) Before the words 'sentence or order' in paragraph 2 the word 'judgment' was introduced
- (5) A proviso limiting the power of the superior Magistrate to those ordinarily exercisable by him under s. 20 of that Act was newly added

Changes introduced in the Code of 1882—

- (1) For the words 'finds an accused person guilty' in the first paragraph the words 'is of opinion that the accused person is guilty' were substituted
- (2) The words 'after hearing the evidence for the prosecution' in the first paragraph were introduced
- (3) For the words 'record the finding' the words 'record the opinion' were substituted
- (4) The proviso was amended by the substitution of the words 'shall not inflict a punishment more severe than' under ss. 32 and 33 for the words 'shall not exceed the powers ordinarily exercisable' under s. 20 of this Act'

Changes introduced in 1898—

No change has been effected except the numbering of the first and second paragraphs of the old section as sub-sections (1) and (2)

Changes introduced in 1923—

Sub-section (1A) has been introduced by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 (XVIII) of 1923. It is similar in terms to sub-s. (2) of s. 348 and is intended to secure identity of treatment to all accused

2 Scope of the section—It is a general principle of law that only an authority who has heard the evidence is competent to decide whether the accused is innocent or guilty.¹ This section creates an exception to this rule in that it provides that the Magistrate to whom the proceedings are submitted under this section may pass such judgment, sentence or order in the case as he thinks fit even on the evidence recorded by the referring Magistrate.² As such it should be construed strictly.³

In order that the section may apply the following conditions must be satisfied—

- (1) The Magistrate submitting proceedings should have jurisdiction to try or commit the case.⁴

(2) He must be of opinion, after hearing the evidence, that the accused is guilty and that he ought to receive a punishment different in kind from or more severe than that which he is empowered to inflict⁵ or that he ought to be required to execute a bond under S 106

(3) He should record such opinion⁶

This section must be read subject to the provisions of S 348 and when a case falls under that section, the Court should proceed only thereunder and not under this section⁷

3 Who can make a reference under this section — This section does not apply to first class Magistrates¹ According to the Chief Court of Lower Burma, it does not also apply to Magistrates trying cases summarily, the reason being that the procedure of this section is obviously unsuited to cases tried summarily² The High Court of Allahabad seems to hold a contrary view³

It is in the discretion of the subordinate Magistrate to decide whether he will send up a case or not under this section An order by a superior Magistrate directing a subordinate Magistrate to send up a case under this section is *ultra vires*⁴ A District Magistrate is not competent to forbid by circular, all subordinate Magistrates in his district from taking up cases (which the Criminal Procedure Code says they may take up) if they think they shall have to act under this section in disposing of the case⁵

4 "Having jurisdiction" — A Magistrate has no power to refer, under this section a case which he has no jurisdiction to try If he does so, his proceedings are illegal and void and will not empower the superior Magistrate to proceed under sub s (2) of this section¹ But where the offence was one for which the Magistrate was not competent to try the accused but for which he was empowered to commit him to the Court of Session, it was held that he was not entirely without jurisdiction and that the Magistrate to whom he referred the case could if he thought proper, commit the same to the Court of Session²

5 Record of opinion — As has been seen in Note 2 above it is necessary that the Magistrate should record his opinion as to the guilt of the accused and the necessity for inflicting on him a punishment different in kind from or more severe than that which he is empowered to give or the necessity for taking a bond from him under S 106 of this Code

Where a case was transferred by a Magistrate of the third class to a District Magistrate without any request to the latter to take up the case and without stating any of the three grounds mentioned in the section, it was held that the transfer could not be considered to be one under this section¹

6 Punishment "different in kind." — It has been held by the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Nagpur that a submission of proceedings for the purpose of taking action under S 262 cannot be considered to be one under this section inasmuch as the order under that section directing the release of the accused on probation of good conduct is not a punishment at all, and is, therefore, not a "punishment different in kind" from that which the Magistrate is empowered to inflict¹ In the undermentioned case² where the sub-Magistrate convicted the two accused and sent up the third (a youth) under this section because he could not deal with a juvenile offender, the High Court of Madras held that the case of all the three accused should have been referred and not that of the third accused alone. It seems to have been assumed that a submission of proceedings in respect of an adolescent offender for being dealt with under S 262 may be done under this section. The actual decision was, however, to the effect that one of the accused alone could not be sent up under this section

7. "More severe" — Where a Magistrate of the third class who is empowered to inflict a fine not exceeding fifty rupees convicted certain persons of theft, but sent them up to a superior Magistrate under this section recommending the infliction of a fine of Rs 15 on them, it was held that the submission was improper inasmuch as the proposed fine could be inflicted by the third class Magistrate himself and as the section did not apply unless the referring Magistrate was of opinion that he was not competent to inflict the punishment deserved by the accused¹

8 "Or that he ought to be required to execute a bond under section 106." — When a Magistrate is of opinion that the accused ought to be required to execute a bond under S 106, he ought not to convict and sentence the accused before referring the case under this section, for S 106 requires that the conviction and order for furnishing security should be passed by one and the same Magistrate¹ If he convicts the accused, his recommendation that an order for furnishing security be passed will be without jurisdiction and any order of the superior Magistrate under S 106 will also be without jurisdiction. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the conviction will be defective² Similarly, where a second class Magistrate sent up a case to a joint Magistrate as he was of opinion that an order under S 106 was necessary, and the latter passed the order under that section, but returned the case to the sub-Magistrate for conviction, it was held that the joint Magistrate acted without jurisdiction³

9. Procedure of referring Magistrate.

"Cannot convict" — A Magistrate submitting proceedings under this section is required only to record his opinion that the accused is guilty¹ but cannot legally convict him² But in view of the amendments effected in S 215, sub s (2) and S 253, sub s (9), it has been held that those sub sections cannot be read as necessarily prohibiting a Magistrate dealing with a case under this section from finding the accused guilty. But the conviction will not be one that has any legality in the sense of prohibiting the Sub-divisional Magistrate or District Magistrate from dealing with the case under this section, or as constituting a conviction which would prevent any further trial under S 403³ Hence, where a Magistrate submitting a case under this section gives a conviction, it is not necessary that it should be formally quashed. It will be treated as mere surplusage and as a legal nullity, so that the Magistrate to whom the case is sent can proceed with it without a reference to the High Court for the purpose of having the conviction formally *quashed*⁴ The High Court of Patna has, however, held that where a Magistrate convicts the accused before referring his case, "ordinarily, the case is one which should go back for re trial owing to the trial Court not carrying out the provisions of S 349"⁵

As to the difference between proceedings under this section and those under S 562, see S 562, Note 3

"Forward the accused" — Under the Code of 1861 the subordinate Magistrate was not required to forward either the accused or the witnesses to the District Magistrate, he had only to submit his proceedings⁶ It was nevertheless held that the accused was entitled to be present before the District Magistrate to offer such reasons as he may have against the finding of the sub Magistrate or to offer his plea for a lenient sentence,⁷ the proceedings before the superior Magistrate being a continuation of the proceedings before the referring Magistrate⁸

'Framing of charge' — See Section 254, Note 6

10 Sub-section (1A)—Several accused.—It was held under the Code of 1862 that it was open to a Magistrate to send up one only of several accused for enhanced punishment and to convict the others himself¹ and, in the absence of any appeal to him, the District Magistrate to whom the case of only some accused was referred had no jurisdiction to set aside the conviction of others regarding whom no reference had been made,² though it was desirable that all the accused should be sent up³ Shortly prior to the coming into force of the amending Act of 1923, it was doubted in the undermentioned case⁴ whether in a case where the Magistrate considers it necessary to proceed against one of several accused under sub s (1), he could validly forward all the other accused also

Under the section as now amended in 1923, it is clear that all the accused must be forwarded in such cases⁵ The failure to send up all the accused will not, however, vitiate the jurisdiction to try such of the accused as are actually sent up⁶

The Magistrate is required to forward only such accused as are in his opinion guilty. An order, referring the case of those accused who in his opinion are not guilty is illegal, they being entitled to an acquittal under Section 259 sub-section (1).⁷

This sub-section has no application to the procedure under S 562. It is therefore open to a Magistrate in a case falling under S 562 to sentence some of the accused and refer the remainder of the accused for the application of S 562.⁸

In the undermentioned case⁹ there were three accused one of them being a boy of fourteen years of age and therefore a young person within the meaning of the Madras Children Act 1920. The Stationary Sub Magistrate was of opinion that this accused should be dealt with under the Madras Children Act and accordingly referred the case so far as this accused was concerned to a joint Magistrate. It was held that the case fell under this sub-section which meant that the Magistrate could not convict any of the accused and was required to send all of them to the joint Magistrate. See also the undermentioned case¹⁰ to a similar effect.

11 To whom reference can be made — Under the Code of 1861 (S 977) the Magistrate had to submit his proceedings to the Magistrate to whom he was subordinate.¹ Under the present Code he should submit his proceedings to the District Magistrate or to a Sub-divisional Magistrate who alone has jurisdiction to dispose of the matter.² The City Magistrate of Nagpur is not a Sub-divisional Magistrate and no reference could be made to him under this section.³ A Magistrate located in a division temporarily in the discharge of his public duties will be deemed to have validly referred his proceedings under this section if he submits them to the Magistrate of that division of the district.⁴

12 Procedure of the Magistrate to whom a case is referred — When proceedings are sent up to a superior Magistrate under this section the whole case is opened up for him to deal with according to his discretion.¹ He is not however bound to hold a trial de novo.² He may act on the evidence recorded by the referring Magistrate and adopt his opinion or he may re-examine the witnesses already examined and take further evidence.³ but in any case he is bound to exercise his independent judgment in the matter and write a judgment according to the provisions of S 367.⁴

But the nature of the trial is not altered by the proceedings being submitted under this section⁵. The superior Magistrate cannot, therefore, convict the accused sent up in an *aggravated form of offence*⁶. Nor could he, where the case was triable summarily, pass a sentence of imprisonment exceeding three months as prescribed by S 262⁷.

Where the superior Magistrate examines the accused under sub s (2), the examination should be reduced to writing as required by S 361⁸.

Where a Magistrate acts irregularly under this section, it is open to the District Magistrate to take the case on his own file or to transfer it to that of some first class Magistrate, the proceedings in either case being taken *de novo*⁹.

13. "Shall pass such judgment, sentence or order." — The superior Magistrate must form his own judgment and pass sentence on the case referred to him. The opinion of the referring Magistrate that the accused is guilty is not binding on the superior Magistrate and the latter may direct an acquittal or discharge². But he must confine himself to merely seeing whether the decision of the referring Magistrate is opposed to the evidence, he must consider whether the evidence is worthy of belief and pass such judgment, sentence or order as he deems proper³. Such judgment should conform to the requirements of S 267 of the Code⁴.

The word "order" in sub s (2), being associated with the words "judgment" and "sentence," what the section contemplates must be taken to be a final order disposing of the case so far as the Magistrate is concerned⁵.

14. Committal to sessions — A Magistrate to whom the proceedings are submitted under this section has power to commit the case to a Court of Session.

The undermentioned cases³ which held a contrary view were decided under the Codes of 1861 and 1872 and are no longer good law

15 Whether superior Magistrate can quash proceedings — A Magistrate to whom a case is submitted under this section has no power to quash the proceedings of the referring Magistrate and send the case to another Magistrate for re trial If he considers that such proceedings are incorrect or illegal he should report them for orders under S 438¹

16 Whether superior Magistrate can return case — A Magistrate to whom proceedings are submitted under this section is not at liberty to return the case to the submitting Magistrate but must dispose of it himself¹ Where a case was returned by a Sub-divisional Magistrate to the submitting Magistrate to pass such sentence as the latter was competent to pass the conviction and sentence of the latter acting under such order were reversed and the Sub-divisional Magistrate directed to dispose of the case himself² Where however, the case was returned for committal although the procedure of the superior Magistrate was held to be incorrect the committal was allowed to stand by the Madras and Calcutta High Courts as not being illegal³ The Bombay High

Court⁴ on the other hand held in a similar case that the action of the Sub-divisional Magistrate in returning the case to the second class Magistrate was illegal and annulled the order of the superior Magistrate but nothing was said about the order of committal being illegal

It has been held in the undermentioned case⁵ that there is nothing illegal in the action of a District Magistrate pointing out that the reference was informal since the inquiry was defective (statements of the accused not having been recorded), and requiring the defect to be supplied before the case was laid before him and further that the proceedings of the submitting Magistrate being incomplete, he is not precluded when he has remedied the defects from coming to a different finding from that previously recorded and acquitting some of the accused whom he had formerly believed to be guilty. On the other hand where a Magistrate recorded a plea of guilty and submitted the case and the same was returned to him with the remark that in warrant cases the accused could not be convicted on a mere plea of guilty, it was held that S 319 does not give the superior Magistrate any power to return the case for supplying omissions and that if there had been any need for taking the accused's defence the superior Magistrate ought to have done it himself⁶

17. Transfer to another Magistrate. — The jurisdiction to deal with proceedings under this section is conferred as has been seen already in Note 11 upon District Magistrates and Sub divisional Magistrates and upon no other Magistrates. A Sub divisional Magistrate to whom a case is submitted under this section cannot therefore transfer it to a Magistrate who is not empowered to act under this section¹. But he can commit the case to a Court of Session or transfer to a District Magistrate who can act under the section.²

18 Whether superior Magistrate can order re trial. — It is open to the superior Magistrate to acquit the accused on the charge framed and order a fresh trial before a competent Magistrate under such section as he thinks proper¹

But a Magistrate should not pass a sentence under S 319 and then try the accused on another charge arising in the same case. If he wishes to do so the proper course for him is to set aside the proceedings and direct a fresh trial before himself *ab initio*²

19 Proviso — When a case is sent up under this section to a District or Sub divisional Magistrate such Magistrate is not competent to inflict a punishment more severe than what he is empowered to inflict under S 32 or S 33¹

A District Magistrate acting under this section must be regarded as a Magistrate not empowered under S 30 and hence cannot pass a sentence longer than what he is de novo.¹ But even under that Code, it was held that in inquiries preliminary to commitment it would be waste of time and vexation to the witnesses to insist on their being examined again in all cases.²

Code of 1872—Section 323 contemplated cases in which only part of the evidence had been recorded by the outgoing Magistrate, it did not contemplate cases where the whole of the evidence had been recorded by the first Magistrate.³

Under the first proviso to S 323 it would seem that where the accused exercised his option and had the witnesses re-summoned, the trial had to commence afresh.

The case of one Magistrate succeeding another pending an enquiry preliminary to commitment was provided for separately by S 329 of the Code of 1872.

While under the Code of 1872 power to set aside the conviction on the ground of prejudice to the accused was given to all Courts of appeal and revision and to the District Magistrate, S 350 of the Code of 1882 mentions only the High Court and the District Magistrate having such power.

Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923—The words "or in which proceedings have been submitted . . . under S 349" have been added to sub s (2) and this addition makes it clear that such proceedings also are not covered by this section. Sub section (3) has been added and sets at rest the question whether the provisions of the section applied to cases where the Magistrate ceases to exercise jurisdiction by reason of the transfer of a case from his file. The amendment endorses the view that had been followed already by the majority of Courts, that such cases also come within the scope of the section.

1. Legislative changes.

Code of 1861 — The Code of 1861 contained no corresponding section and hence, when a Magistrate was transferred pending a part heard case, the same had to be heard

This section does not purport to deal with cases in which process has been issued by a Magistrate who is transferred before the cases come up for hearing. But it has been held that a similar rule must prevail and that if jurisdiction may as a matter of course be exercised by the successor after evidence has begun there seems no reason why it should not be exercised where it has not been commenced.¹³

Where a Magistrate is transferred pending a trial but the case is also transferred to his file for completion by him, there is no necessity for a de novo trial, there being no change of Magistrates and the judicial mind brought to bear on the case throughout being the same. Neither this section nor any other provides for such a case.¹³

Similarly where a Bench of Magistrates consisting of A and B hears a case but the depositions are recorded by A and subsequently the Bench is dissolved and the case is transferred to A alone sitting singly this section does not apply and he is not bound to rehear the witnesses already examined by him.¹⁴ See also Note 14.

This section does not permit of a commitment by a Magistrate upon evidence recorded partly by himself and partly by a Magistrate who has not ceased to exercise jurisdiction.¹⁵

Section 398 of the Code of 1872 was more restricted in its scope than the present section and did not allow of one Magistrate's deciding a case upon evidence wholly recorded by another.¹⁶ But on principles analogous to s 328, the High Court declined to interfere when the accused was not prejudiced.¹⁷

Where evidence has been recorded wholly or partly by a Magistrate who has no jurisdiction and the case is then transferred to the file of a Magistrate having jurisdiction, this section does not apply and such evidence cannot be legally considered by the latter Magistrate: the trial must be held de novo.¹⁸

2a Applicability of the section to summary trials — The Nagpur High Court holds that this section applies to summary trials.¹ The opposite view is held by the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court.² The conflict of views arises from the fact that this section applies to cases where the evidence has been recorded wholly or partially by the first Magistrate whereas the recording of evidence is dispensed with under the law in the case of summary trials. According to the Nagpur High Court notwithstanding this if evidence is recorded as a matter of fact in a particular case there is no reason why this section should not apply to it. The Sind Court thinks that such evidence does not form part of the record and cannot be taken into consideration under this section.

Where a case is summarily tried by a Magistrate and before the trial is complete the case is transferred to another Magistrate having no power to try cases summarily, the latter Magistrate must commence the trial de novo. The reason is that a case cannot be tried summarily as to a part of it and in the ordinary way as to the rest of it.³

The section is wide enough to cover every trial or enquiry under the Code⁵ and is applicable to summons cases as well as to warrant cases⁶. Its application is however, limited to Magistrates, the section does not cover trials before Sessions Judges, so that a Sessions Judge is not empowered to try a case in which part of the evidence has not been recorded by himself⁷. Not even the accused's consent will give the Sessions Judge such jurisdiction⁸. But where a sessions trial had not begun but only the preliminary proceedings of swearing in the jury and reading out of the charges to them had been gone through before a change of Judge took place it was held that the successor could conduct the trial without going through the preliminary proceedings over again⁹.

The application of the section is not confined to the single occurrence of one Magistrate succeeding another as may be suggested by the use of the word 'second' in proviso (a). On principle if a second Magistrate can act on evidence recorded by his predecessor there seems to be no reason why a third Magistrate should not act on evidence recorded by his predecessors¹⁰.

Nor is there any distinction between cases where there has been a change of Magistrates in the course of the enquiry in the original Court and cases where the inquiry has been closed by one Magistrate in the original Court by an order of discharge and then re opened by the Sessions Judge when another Magistrate has succeeded¹¹. to act on the evidence recorded by his predecessor or partly by his predecessor and partly by himself¹

The undermentioned cases² which held that when a case is remanded for further enquiry to another Magistrate by a Court of revision, the Magistrate must hear the evidence over again are not really restrictive of the scope of S 350 but are based upon the interpretation therein placed on the words "further inquiry" in S 436

But he cannot re-commence the enquiry and at the same time rely upon evidence already recorded³

A statement of an accused was recorded by a Magistrate who was thereafter transferred. The case was subsequently committed to sessions by his successor. It was held that the statement though not recorded by the committing Magistrate could nevertheless, in view of S 350 be admitted in evidence in the sessions case under S 287⁴

6 Delivery of judgment of predecessor — Section 350 gives a Magistrate jurisdiction under certain circumstances to decide a case upon evidence recorded by his predecessor but does it give him a jurisdiction to deliver a judgment written by the latter? According to the Calcutta High Court it does not, the reason being that the Magistrate who makes himself responsible for the judgment, must always be the Magistrate who, before delivery thereof, had considered the evidence on record fairly and had also listened to the arguments, if any, of the accused¹. The Rangoon High Court also agrees with this view but points out that if there is no demand for a new trial by the accused the succeeding Magistrate may take the judgment of his predecessor and compare it with the evidence recorded in the case and if he finds that it expresses what he himself would have decided in the case he may deliver it as his own judgment². The Nagpur High Court has also followed the view of the Calcutta High Court³

The High Court of Madras and the Chief Court of Oudh take the opposite view, viz., that there is no irregularity in a Magistrate's pronouncing the judgment of his predecessor⁴

3 "Ceases to exercise jurisdiction." — Where a Magistrate is transferred from one district to another, his jurisdiction ceases in the former district when the transfer takes effect,¹ and he can no longer be held to be the presiding officer of the Court from which he was transferred.² With his transfer his office qua the exercise of jurisdiction in any particular case in which he was engaged is vacated.³

But the words "ceases to exercise jurisdiction therein" do not mean that the Magistrate should have ceased to occupy the particular post, but mean that he should have ceased to exercise jurisdiction in the enquiry or trial.⁴ Thus, the words would apply even to cases where the Magistrate's connection with a part heard case is terminated by the transfer of the case to the file of another Magistrate.⁵ See Note 17.

A mere shifting of local areas from the jurisdiction of one Magistrate to that of another does not automatically remove cases from the file of the former, and the former will not automatically cease to have jurisdiction over such cases.⁶

Nor does a Magistrate cease to have jurisdiction in a case merely by absenting himself from a subsequent hearing.⁷

4. "Is succeeded by another Magistrate." — When a new officer is appointed to any magisterial office he becomes the successor of the outgoing Magistrate.¹ Further, when a case is transferred from the file of one Magistrate to that of another, the former is succeeded by the latter in the sense that the latter exercises the jurisdiction over the case which had been exercised by the Magistrate who had begun it.² See Note 17.

On the death of a Magistrate empowered under § 80 of the Code, the District Magistrate, being the only remaining Magistrate in the district having powers under that section, took upon his file a case which was being tried by the deceased Magistrate. It was held that the District Magistrate must be regarded as having succeeded the deceased within the meaning of this section.³ See also Note 14.

5. "May act on the evidence so recorded." — When the accused persons do not insist upon a re hearing of the witnesses, a Magistrate succeeding another is entitled

At the same time the Madras High Court makes it clear that a Magistrate cannot be compelled to pronounce a judgment of his predecessor and thereby adopt it as his own.⁴ The Allahabad High Court has considered the procedure as being at most an irregularity curable under S 537 in the absence of prejudice to the accused.⁵ The Lahore High Court has held a similar view in the undermentioned cases.⁷

The Madras and Lahore High Courts have held in the cases cited below⁹ that even where the accused demands a re-hearing the Magistrate is entitled to refuse his request and deliver the judgment written by his predecessor. This view proceeds on the ground that trial must be deemed to have ended on the writing and signing of the judgment by the first Magistrate and the mere pronouncing of the judgment is no part of the trial. But in the undermentioned decision⁸ the Madras High Court considered it very doubtful if a re-hearing could be refused if it was demanded by the accused. The Oudh Chief Court has also held that a re-hearing cannot be refused if it is demanded by the accused on the ground of there having been a change in the Magistrates.¹⁰

There is however certainly no provision in the Code for delivery of a judgment written by a Magistrate after he had ceased to have jurisdiction in the district.¹¹ A judgment so written is in fact no judgment at all.¹²

7 Proviso (a) — The discretion given to a Magistrate by sub s. (1) to act or not to act in a trial upon evidence recorded by his predecessor is controlled by this proviso.¹ Under this proviso the accused is entitled to demand that witnesses already examined be re-called and re-heard.² As to whether he is entitled to demand that witnesses examined on commission be re-examined see Note 10. witness as required by the accused is a defect which is not curable by S 537³. The Madras High Court has however held that proviso (b) applies to such cases and that the proceedings are not vitiated in absence of prejudice⁴. But subject to giving effect to this right of the accused the option lies with the Magistrate to start the inquiry or trial all over again or not⁵. The accused has no right to insist that there shall not be a de novo trial or inquiry and if the Magistrate begins the proceedings anew against the wishes of the accused, the Magistrate's action is not without jurisdiction⁶. In such a case no question of prejudice to the accused arises⁷.

Even though in the first instance the accused may demand a re-examination of witnesses he can change his mind and say that he wishes only certain witnesses to be examined⁸. But there is nothing in this section which prohibits the Magistrate from exercising his discretion of examining all the witnesses again, merely because the accused has exercised his right under this proviso⁹.

The proviso does not apply unless the accused asks for a re-hearing¹⁰ and where a trial is impeached on the ground that a re-hearing was refused, it is insufficient to make a general allegation of such refusal, without any specific allegation as to the date when and the person to whom the application was made, and the order thereon¹¹.

The mere fact that at the time of the framing of the charge the accused stated that he did not wish the witnesses to be recalled should not deter the Magistrate's successor from acting under this section¹² and if a case is remanded for further inquiry, and in the meanwhile there is a change of Magistrates the new Magistrate is bound to accede to the accused's request under this proviso notwithstanding that the remand had been made only for recording further evidence¹³.

The accused's right is to have the witnesses re summoned and re heard and not merely that their former statements be read out to him¹⁵ He cannot be asked to pay the expenses of re summoning the witnesses¹⁶

The right conferred by this proviso is a valuable one and is as fundamental as the right to be heard in one's own defence and the right to cross examine. The accused can of course waive the right if he wants, but if he does not want to waive it, then he can insist that the witnesses be re-summoned and re-heard. That is the force of the word "demand".

The extent of the right of the accused is only to have the witnesses re called and re examined¹⁸ He is not entitled to demand a re trial as such¹⁹ It has been held that the accused is not entitled under the proviso to claim a re hearing on the ground that "his pleader's arguments were not heard by the previous Magistrate²⁰ Where, after a charge is framed in the trial of a warrant case the case comes before a new Magistrate and the witnesses are re summoned and re heard as required by the accused, he is not entitled to have the prosecution witnesses re called again for further cross examination²¹ Where the Magistrate has not exercised his option of re summoning the witnesses and recommencing the inquiry or trial, it is open to an accused who has demanded the re summoning and re hearing of witnesses under this proviso, to ask that the evidence of any particular witness should not be taken afresh²² Where witnesses for prosecution are re summoned for examination at the instance of the accused under this proviso, the order in which they should be examined in chief rests with the prosecution²³ Emperor (But it is submitted that the question as to the ground on which the accused applies for prejudice to accused)

This section in no way affects the provisions of s 33 of the Evidence Act and if a de novo trial is conducted but one of the witnesses cannot be re-summoned because he is dead his evidence may nevertheless be admitted under s 33 of the Evidence Act²⁴

8 Application for re hearing when to be made — The time when the accused may apply under proviso (a) is when the second Magistrate commences his proceedings that is when the case is called on with the Magistrate on the Bench and the accused in the dock and the representatives for the prosecution and for the defence (if the accused are defended) are present in the Court for the hearing of the case¹

The option given to the accused can be exercised by him *only once*² An accused who has asked for a re hearing of the witnesses can change his mind and leave the Court free to exercise its statutory option to act upon the evidence already recorded³

9 Who can demand de novo trial — The proviso is entirely in the interests of the accused and it is for him to say who is to be re-summoned and re heard. The complainant has no privilege under s 350 and cannot demand a re hearing¹

10 Proviso, if applicable to inquiries — This proviso is limited to criminal trials and is not applicable to inquiries¹ Thus it does not apply to inquiries preparatory to a commitment² or to proceedings in warrant cases before a charge is framed such proceedings being held to amount only to inquiries³ The Lahore High Court, however, in the undermentioned case,⁴ seems to hold the view that the proviso is available to an accused even in proceedings prior to the framing of a charge. The Sind Judicial Commissioners Court has also held that a trial within the meaning of the proviso does not commence with the framing of the charge in warrant cases but commences when the accused appears or is brought before the Court under s 252 and that, therefore, the proviso applies even to cases where a charge has not been framed⁵ The Bombay High Court has also held that trial includes the proceedings before the charge is framed⁶

As to whether proceedings under Chapter VIII of the Code are enquiries or trials within the meaning of this section, there is a difference of opinion. In a Full Bench case of the Madras High Court Ayling J. was of opinion that they were only enquiries while Wallis J. was of the opinion that they were trials⁷ It was also held in an earlier Calcutta case that there was so much similarity in substance between enquiries into offences and inquiries for taking security that the proviso should be equally applicable to both⁸ Whether or not the proviso to s 350 applies suo vigore to proceedings under Chapter VIII, it has been definitely held that the proviso is, nevertheless, applicable by virtue of the provisions of s 117 sub s (2)⁹

The object of re-summoning witnesses who have already been examined is that the Magistrate may see their demeanour in the witness box. changing his mind before he actually re commences the enquiry.³

Whether the Magistrate acts suo motu and grants a de novo trial or accedes to the demand of the accused, his duty is to re summon and re hear the witnesses and not merely to allow further cross examination.⁴ The word "re heard" means that the witnesses should be heard afresh from the start, i e, they should be examined afresh in chief and then cross examined, if the accused so desires.⁵ The object in granting a re hearing is to enable the Magistrate who hears the case to judge of the credibility of the witnesses by their demeanour.⁶ This object is lost if the witnesses are not examined again but only cross examined.⁷ Failure to examine the witnesses in chief amounts to an illegality which vitiates the trial and the mere fact that the accused acquiesces in the procedure adopted by the Magistrate does not estop him from raising the plea of illegality of the trial.⁸ Where the Magistrate permitted the re hearing of witnesses but the prosecution declined to examine them again, and the accused without raising any objection only cross examined those witnesses, it was held that the provisions of S 350 were not complied with and it was impossible to say that the accused were not prejudiced.⁹ It has, however, been held by the Oudh Chief Court that where the evidence of the witness who is only cross-examined before the second Magistrate has been discarded in arriving at the conclusion, there can be no prejudice to the accused caused by the omission of the prosecution to examine the witness and that the trial is not vitiated.¹⁰ The undermentioned decision¹¹ lays down that non compliance with the demand to have witnesses re summoned and re heard will not prejudice the accused when the witnesses are further cross examined by the Magistrate who decided the case (But there is a conflict of decisions as to whether non compliance with accused's demand for re hearing under proviso (a) is a curable irregularity see Note 7) Merely reading their depositions to the witnesses¹² or exhibiting them¹³ is not re hearing them.

When a superior Court directs an inquiry by a Magistrate other than the one who originally heard the case, the provisions of S 350 debar it from directing that the case should be proceeded with from a particular stage.¹⁴ Where such a direction was made, and on the case going back it was found that the original Magistrate had been transferred, it was held that the directions did not apply to his successor.¹⁵ The same may be said of transfers the operation of s 350 cannot be checked by any restrictions in the order of transfer¹⁶ As to instances where the High Court has ordered re inquiry from a particular stage where the accused undertakes not to ask for a re trial, see the undermentioned cases¹⁷ The right of the Magistrate under subs (1) to re commence the proceedings applies not only to trials but also to cases where the stage of trial has not been reached¹⁸ It has been held that when a de novo trial is held the prosecution is not bound to examine all the witnesses who were examined at the original trial and that it is open to the prosecution to dispense with the evidence of any witness whom it regards as unreliable¹⁹

13 From what stage inquiry may be re-commenced — When a Magistrate succeeding another elects to conduct a de novo trial, he cannot summarily dismiss the complaint under s 203, it being no longer a question of deciding whether or not proceedings should be taken on the complaint¹ Nor can he refer the matter to the police under s 202 The inquiry which he can re commence is the inquiry as defined in s 4 which does not include a reference to the police²

It has been held by the High Court of Madras that a Magistrate who re commences an inquiry or trial does not thereby modify its nature or the stage at which it has arrived Thus where the proceedings re commenced are only an inquiry, they are re commenced as an inquiry, and where they have developed into a trial stage they are re commenced as a trial, i.e., a proceeding in which a charge has been framed, in other words, a charge once framed is not wiped out or cancelled by a de novo trial³ A similar view has also been taken by the Allahabad High Court in a recent decision⁴ The Chief Court of Oudh has held that whatever might be the interpretation as regards cases falling under the first sub section proper, this principle will apply to cases of re hearing under proviso (a) and that a charge once framed is not wiped out by granting such a re hearing⁵ But the same Court has held in a subsequent case that if the Magistrate frames a new charge the accused cannot have any cause for grievance, inasmuch as under s 227 (1) a Court can alter or add to any charge at any time before judgment is pronounced⁶ The Chief Court

14a. Transfer of a case from a Bench of Magistrates to a Magistrate.

— Where under Rule 6 of the rules framed by the Bengal Government under S 16, on a difference of opinion between an even number of Honorary Magistrates, a case was referred back to the Sub divisional Officer, it was held that the provisions of this section applied and the Sub divisional Officer could continue the case from the stage at which it was when the transfer to him was made¹ The Madras High Court has held that where a case is partly tried by a first class Bench under its summary powers and then is transferred to a second class Magistrate having no summary powers, the latter can try it only by means of a complete de novo trial and that this section has no application to the trial by the second class Magistrate subsequent to the transfer of the case to his file²

15. Proviso (b) — Prejudice to the accused. — A judgment arrived at by a Magistrate upon evidence not wholly recorded by himself is considered by the framers of Code to be of such infirmity that it is liable to be set aside without an appeal, provided that the accused has been actually prejudiced thereby³

It does not matter whether the accused did or did not object to the procedure, nor is it necessary to consider whether or not he had a reasonable opportunity of entering a protest thereto, the real question is whether he was prejudiced by the course adopted² If he was, the conviction will be set aside,³ if he was not, the High Court will refuse to interfere⁴ See also Note 7

In a case of defamation it was held that though the Magistrate's deciding the case upon evidence recorded by his predecessor was not without jurisdiction, still it was difficult to see how a Magistrate could adequately decide such a case without having had the complainant examined before him⁵

Under this proviso a District Magistrate can set aside convictions by Magistrates subordinate to him This would include first class Magistrates even though no appeal lies to the District Magistrate from convictions by the former, for, as pointed out in the undermentioned cases⁶ which discussed the meaning of the words "inferior" and "subordinate" occurring in Ss 435 and 437, S 17 makes all Magistrates in the district subordinate to the District Magistrate.

16 Sub-section (2) — It is a general principle of law that evidence taken by one Magistrate is not evidence in a trial before another, unless some provision of law expressly makes it so. There is nothing in S 346 enabling a Magistrate to whom the case is referred to act on the evidence recorded by the referring Magistrate¹ and sub-s (2) of S 350 expressly makes the provisions of the section inapplicable to proceedings stayed under S 346². Hence it follows that a Magistrate hearing a case sent to him under S 346, must hear the same de novo and cannot act on evidence already recorded by the Magistrate who transferred the case³.

Under S 349 it is in the discretion of the superior Magistrate to whom a case is referred to act or not to act upon evidence already recorded by the subordinate Magistrate⁴. The addition of the words 'or in which proceedings have been submitted to a superior Magistrate under S 349' to the sub-section in 1923 makes it clear that nothing in this section will apply to cases submitted under S 349. The discretion, therefore, that the superior Magistrate has under S 349, is uncontrolled by the proviso to S 350 and he cannot, therefore, be compelled to hold a de novo trial⁵.

17 Sub-section (3) — Transfer of cases — The earlier view was that the provisions of this section did not apply where a change of Magistrates had occurred by a transfer or withdrawal of a case from the file of one Magistrate to that of another¹. But latterly it was recognized that the section applied even to such transfers or withdrawals².

This sub section is applicable to a case where a case has been sent from one Magistrate to another for retrial, even if it is only from a particular point in the trial and as a result of the order of the Sessions Court.⁴

It has been pointed out that, though S 350 is applicable to cases transferred or withdrawn from the file of one Magistrate to that of another, it is desirable that the second Magistrate should commence the hearing de novo.⁵

1. Scope of the section.—Before the introduction of this section into the Code by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923, it was uniformly held that where a judgment was delivered by the necessary quorum of Magistrates who had been present throughout the trial, the judgment would be perfectly valid though some other Magistrates had also been present at the earlier stages of the trial,¹ but there was a difference of opinion on the question whether a judgment delivered by a Bench of Magistrates some of whom had not heard the whole of the evidence could be considered to be a valid judgment. According to one view the fundamental principle of law is that no person who has not heard the whole of the evidence is competent to pass or take part in passing the judgment in the case, and that a judgment so passed is a nullity.² Another view was that the only question in each case was whether the accused was prejudiced by the course adopted.³ In this view it was held that a Government Notification under S 16, clause (c), which provided that "if any case is adjourned and the members at the adjourned sessions are not the same as sat at the first hearing of the case, the provisions of S 350 of the Criminal Procedure Code will be held to apply to the case," was not ultra vires.⁴ A third view was that such a Government Notification was ultra vires of the powers of the Local Government under S 16, clause (c).⁵

The present section now makes it clear that no change in the constitution of the Bench during the progress of a trial will affect the validity of the judgment passed, provided — firstly, that the Bench by which the judgment is passed is duly constituted, and secondly, that the Magistrates constituting the same (i.e., the Bench which passed the judgment) have been present on the Bench throughout the proceedings

See also Note 4

2 "Duly constituted under sections 15 and 16"—A Bench of Magistrates will be "duly constituted under ss 15 and 16" if—

- (1) the individuals sitting as a Bench have all been authorized by the Provincial Government under S 15 to sit together as a Bench, and
- (2) the number of such individuals is not less than the quorum fixed by rules framed by the Provincial Government under S 16, clause (c)

Suppose that A, B, C, D and E are all authorized under rules framed under S 15 to sit together as a Bench and under the rules framed under S 16, clause (c) the quorum for a valid Bench is declared to be two. If now A, B and C sit together to hear a case, but C is absent during subsequent hearings thereof and A and B finally deliver judgment in the case, the judgment is perfectly valid notwithstanding the change in the personnel of the Bench in the course of the trial, inasmuch as A and B form a duly "constituted" Bench (i.e. they form the necessary quorum) and they have been present throughout the proceedings.¹ In Chiteshwar Dube v Emperor,² Niamatullah J, however, took the view that all the Magistrates who began to hear the case must be present at all the hearings irrespective of the quorum in order to render the ultimate judgment valid. This view was dissented from by a Bench of the same High Court in Dasrath Rai v Emperor,³ but Sulaiman C J in the latter case, observed as follows: "It is not easy to see how the constitution of the Bench can be changed and at the same time the Magistrates constituting the Bench be present on the Bench throughout the proceedings." In making this observation his Lordship does not appear to have laid the necessary emphasis on the words 'duly constituted' used in the section. A Bench may be constituted by several Magistrates appointed under s 15 and there may be a change in the constitution of such Bench. But if the duly constituted Bench under s 16, i.e. the quorum fixed, passes the judgment it would be valid provided the Magistrates constituting such quorum have been present on the Bench throughout the proceedings.

A Bench which consists of a number of Magistrates, which is less than the quorum fixed is not a *duly constituted Bench*⁴ and evidence recorded by it is not recorded by a Court.⁵ See also the case cited below.⁶

the effect that this section is, in terms, a saving clause which does not directly prohibit or declare invalid the trial of a case in the absence of the conditions specified, but only indirectly or by implication assumes such trial to be irregular, and that non compliance with the terms of the section is only irregularity curable by S 537.

5. Transfer of a case from a Bench of Magistrates to a Magistrate — See Note 14a on Section 350

351.* (1) Any person attending a Criminal Court, although not Detention of offenders under arrest or upon a summons, may be detained by attending Court such Court for the purpose of inquiry into or trial of any offence of which such Court can take cognizance and which, from the evidence, may appear to have been committed, and may be proceeded against as though he had been arrested or summoned.

(2) When the detention takes place in the course of an inquiry under Chapter XVIII or after a trial has been begun, the proceedings in respect of such person shall be commenced afresh, and the witnesses re-heard

1 Scope of the section — The following conditions are necessary for the application of the section —

(1) An offence must appear to have been committed on the evidence in the case before the Court,

(2) such offence must be one of which the Court can take cognizance and

(3) the person who appears to have committed the offence must be present in Court¹

This section does not by itself confer any power of taking cognizance of the offence disclosed in the evidence. It only prescribes the procedure to be followed when an offence of which the Court can take cognizance is disclosed on the evidence in the case

The ordinary procedure where any person is to be proceeded against for any offence judicially is to issue a process against him. This section is an exception to this general rule and enables the Court to at once, detain the offender in custody without issuing any such process

As to the principle on which cognizance is taken in such cases see Notes 3 5 and 10 on Section 190

There is however, nothing in the Code which states that a Magistrate is bound at any stage of a trial, to stop the proceedings arrest any person against whom he thinks there is a chance of getting a conviction, and start the original trial *de novo*². As to the considerations to be borne in mind in exercising the discretion under this section, see the undermentioned cases³ tution of a Bench has been changed during the time when the trial was pending. The section makes a provision that its terms will apply if the members of the particular Bench have been constant throughout. But it is not intended to affect the other sections of the Code for instance S 350 which may be declared applicable under Rules under S 16 to such cases. Hence the mere fact that some of the Magistrates constituting the Bench by which the judgment is delivered were not present throughout the proceedings does not invalidate the judgment)

1a Courts to be open — It is a fundamental principle of law and procedure that every Court of Justice should be open to every subject of the King. As was observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in *McPherson v McPherson*¹

Publicity is the authentic hall mark of judicial as distinct from administrative procedure. The actual presence of the public is never of course necessary. Where Courts are held in remote parts of the Province as they frequently must be there may be no members of the public available to attend. But even so the Court must be open to any who may present themselves for admission.

The proviso to this section however permits the presiding Judge or Magistrate to hold a trial in camera if he thinks fit see Note 5

1 Evidence of pardanashin lady — See Section 503 Note 6

2 Trial in jail — Trial in jail is not illegal when there is nothing to show that admittance was refused to anyone who desired it¹. It is within the discretion of the Magistrate to hold a trial at a place other than the court house. But where he decides to hold the trial in the jail premises he should pass a formal order directing that the trial should deposition of a medical witness and his report and the report of a chemical examiner are admissible in evidence without the medical officer or the chemical examiner being called. Similarly, under the Extradition Act, 1870, the deposition or statements on oath taken in a foreign State may, if duly authenticated, be received in evidence.³ These provisions however, are all exceptions to the general rule of evidence that all evidence should be direct (see s 60, Evidence Act) and have no bearing on this section.

4 "Shall be taken in the presence of the accused" — The section is imperative that all evidence shall be taken in the presence of the accused, or in certain circumstances, in the presence of his pleader. It is not sufficient under the section to read out to a witness his previous deposition in a former case and ask him if the statements made therein are true¹ nor is it sufficient to read out to the accused the deposition of the

Difference between the Codes of 1861 and 1872 —

The provisions of the corresponding section in the Code of 1861 applied only to summons cases. The Code of 1872 extended the provisions also to cases of the kind referred to in Section 222 of that Code (now Section 260)

Difference between the Codes of 1872 and 1882 —

The words 'otherwise than at a summary trial' after the words "Magistrate of the first or second class, occurring in the Code of 1872 were omitted in S 355 of the Code of 1882, as they were thought to be redundant since those words already occurred in S 354

Difference between the Codes of 1882 and 1898 —

- (1) The words 'clauses (b) to (m)' were substituted for "clauses (b) to (k), in consequence of offences added in Section 260'
- (2) The provisions of this section have been extended also to proceedings under S 514

2 Scope of the section — There are three different kinds of procedure prescribed by the Code in the matter of recording of evidence in the trial of cases

- (1) In summary trials (Ss 260 to 265) no evidence need be recorded by the Magistrate'
- (2) In regular trials of summons cases by a Magistrate other than a Presidency Magistrate and of cases of offences mentioned in S 260, clauses (b) to (m), and in proceedings under S 514 the Magistrate shall make a memorandum of the substance of the evidence of each witness as his examination proceeds (S 355) In such cases, however, under S 358 it is open to the Magistrate, if he thinks fit, to take down the evidence of the witnesses in the manner provided by S 356 or Section 357
- (3) In regular trials of cases not falling within this section, the procedure prescribed by Ss 356 to 365 should be followed

 (34) 21 AIR 1934 Bom 157 (158) 54 Bom 298 35 Cri L Jour 841, In re Tippanna Koutya taddar (Do)

3. Sub-section (1) of section 260, clauses (b) to (m). — Section 354 makes it clear that this and the following sections do not apply to *summary trials*¹ Thus, it does not apply to cases of the offences specified in subs (1) of S 260, clauses (b) to (m), if tried summarily, and therefore in such cases the Magistrate is not bound to make any memorandum of the substance of the evidence of each witness. Even if he makes such a memorandum, the notes do not form part of the record² But, if the Magistrate does not try the offences under the provisions of S 260 but tries them in the ordinary course, he is required under this section to make a memorandum of the evidence³ The High Court of Calcutta has, however, held that such memorandum, if taken, would form part of the record and cannot be destroyed by the Magistrate⁴ An offence of theft under ss 379, 380 and 381, Penal Code, where the value of the property stolen does not exceed Rs 50, is one falling under S 260, Cl (d), and when tried regularly, is governed by this section⁵ But a charge of theft under the said sections combined with a charge of previous conviction for a similar offence has been held to be a different offence not falling within clause (d) Neither a summary procedure nor this section will apply to such a case⁶

4. "Shall make a memorandum of the substance of the evidence" — This section requires only a memorandum to be made of the substance of the evidence given. Such a memorandum should not, however, be inadequate or vague,¹ but must be full²

The Code is silent as to the language in which such a memorandum is to be recorded, consequently, if a subordinate Magistrate, not authorized to take down evidence in English, records the memorandum of the substance of such evidence in English, there is nothing illegal in it³

The memorandum under this section need not be read over to the witnesses inasmuch as it is not evidence proper. Section 360 does not apply to such cases⁴

5. "Each witness" — The direction of the section that the Magistrate must make "a memorandum of the substance of the evidence of each witness," is not complied

6 "Signed by the Magistrate" — It was held in the undermentioned case¹ that an omission by the Magistrate to sign the memorandum of the substance of the evidence recorded by him vitiated the trial. But in view of the decision of the Privy Council in *Abdul Rahman v Emperor*² the failure of the Magistrate merely to sign the memorandum cannot be regarded as sufficient by itself to vitiate the conviction³

7 Reasons for inability to record as required — Sub section (3) requires that the Magistrate must make a memorandum of the substance of the evidence with his own hand unless he records valid reasons for not doing so. He is not entitled to attend to other work during the hearing of the case and to plead that other work as the reason for his inability to comply with this requirement¹

(2) When the evidence of such witness is given in English, the Magistrate or Sessions Judge may take it down in that language with his own hand, and, unless the accused is familiar with English, or the language of the Court is English, an authenticated translation of such evidence in the language of the Court shall form part of the record

1 Legislative changes — Change made in 1928—Sub s (2A) was newly added, by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923

2 Scope of the section — Section 355 provides for the manner in which evidence is to be recorded in certain specified cases. This section provides for the manner of recording of evidence in all other trials before Magistrates and Courts of Session and in all inquiries under chapters XII¹ and XVIII. This section applies only to cases to which the provisions of S 355 do not apply²

3 In all other trials. — See Note 9

4 Proceedings for security for good behaviour — An inquiry in a proceeding for demanding security for good behaviour should, under the provisions of S 117 be conducted and evidence recorded as in warrant cases. The manner in which evidence is to be recorded in warrant cases is that prescribed by this section and consequently evidence in inquiries under S 117 on an order for security for good behaviour, should be taken in the manner prescribed by this section¹

5 Record of evidence — Sub section (1) — Under this section the entire evidence must be recorded fully¹ either by the Magistrate himself or by somebody else under his direction and in his presence in the language of the Court. This provision is mandatory and an omission to record the evidence in the manner provided is a material irregularity sufficient to set aside the proceedings². But where evidence is recorded but not in the language of the Court the defect is merely an irregularity and not an illegality which would vitiate the trial. The essence of the rule contained in sub s (1) is the taking down in writing of the evidence of each witness and not the taking down in writing of the same in the language of the Court as is shown by the provisions of S 357 under which if the Provincial Government so directs the evidence may be taken down in the mother tongue of the Judge or in English³. So where the error is only one of procedure and does not go to the root of the trial and neither causes prejudice to the accused nor occasions a failure of justice, it is cured by S 537⁴.

Generally speaking where evidence is given by a witness in his own language the vernacular record is always more reliable and entitled to greater weight than the memorandum which the Judge makes in English⁵. Where however, the deposition taken down in the language of the Court is destroyed and the memorandum in English made by the Magistrate under sub s (8) is very full and careful a conviction based on such a memorandum is not invalid⁶.

6 Evidence of each witness shall be taken — Taking down evidence means taking down the statement of a witness *in full as he deposes*¹. Therefore where a Magistrate in recording the evidence of a medical witness, instead of taking down his statements simply recorded that the injuries on the accused were fully detailed in the medical certificate, the procedure is improper² The evidence of each witness must be taken as the examination proceeds and this requirement is not complied with by a mere record that a witness 'deposes as the last witness did'³ or "corroborates another witness"⁴

The practice of recording evidence piecemeal and not at a stretch is highly irregular⁵

The record of the deposition of each witness in the Sessions Court must be a faithful record of what the witness states in that Court and it is improper while so recording the deposition to base it on the deposition as recorded by the committing Court⁶

7 Language of the Court — The language of the Court is that determined by the Provincial Government under S 558

8 "Shall be signed" — The presiding officer of the Court must sign the deposition of the witness examined by him The object is to ensure the accuracy of the record¹

Where the Court is composed of more than one Judge it is not necessary that all the Judges should sign the deposition It is enough if the presiding Judge signs it²

There is no provision of law which makes it obligatory on the Court to attest the deposition in the presence of the accused, though it is desirable that the depositions should be taken and attested in the presence of the accused and a few apt words written on the face of the deposition to make it apparent that this has been done³ See S 509 which makes such a thing obligatory for the purpose of that section

The signature of the deponent is not made compulsory though it is desirable that such signatures also should be obtained A refusal to sign a deposition however is not an offence under S 180 of the Penal Code⁴

9 Record of oath — There is nothing in the Code or elsewhere which requires a Court examining a witness to record the fact that the oath was administered to him Where the record does not show that the oath was administered to a witness the reasonable presumption in the absence of any suggestion to the contrary would be that proper procedure was followed and the oath duly administered¹

S 357 there is no occasion to call in aid the provisions of sub s (2) of this section to justify the recording of evidence in English and hence the requirement of that sub section as to an authenticated translation of the evidence in the language of the Court cannot come into operation¹

10 Sub section (2A) — This sub section was newly added in 1923. The reason is thus stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons

Section 356 does not provide for evidence being taken down in any other language than that of the Court or if the language of the Court is not English in English. The result is a certain loss of accuracy whenever evidence is given in a third language as it has to be translated into and taken down in the language of the Court or in English. The object of the amendment is to secure greater accuracy and to avoid waste of time in translation¹

11 Sub section (3) — The provisions of this sub section apply only to cases in which the evidence recorded under sub s (1) is not recorded in the Magistrate's own hand¹. It is supplementary to the provisions in sub s (1) and cannot override the provisions therein². Where therefore there is only a memorandum in English and such a memorandum is not made as the examination of each witness is proceeding and it is not signed by the Judge the irregularity is so serious that the conviction will be quashed³. But where the evidence is recorded in the language of the Court and the Magistrate does not make a memorandum in English the failure is only an irregularity which is curable by Section 537⁴.

The Calcutta High Court has suggested in the undermentioned case⁵ that provisions should be made for recording full and accurate shorthand notes of proceedings at sessions trials.

12 Sub section (4) — The Magistrate or the Sessions Judge when he does not himself take down the evidence in writing is bound under sub s (3) to make a memorandum of the substance of the evidence and this must be written and signed by the Magistrate with his own hand unless he is prevented from doing so in which case he must, under sub s (4) record the reason of his inability to make it. Pressure of other work is not a valid reason within the meaning of this sub section¹.

357. (1) The ^a[Provincial Government] may direct that in any

Language of record district or part of a district, or in proceedings before any of evidence Court of Session, or before any Magistrate or class of Magistrates the evidence of each witness shall, in the cases referred to in section 356, be taken down by the Sessions Judge or Magistrate with his own hand and in his mother-tongue, unless he is prevented by any sufficient reason from taking down the evidence of any witness, in which case he shall record the reason of his inability to do so and shall cause the evidence to be taken down in writing from his dictation in open Court

(2) The evidence so taken down shall be signed by the Sessions Judge or Magistrate, and shall form part of the record

Provided that the ^a[Provincial Government] may direct the Sessions Judge or Magistrate to take down the evidence in the English language or in the language of the Court, although such language is not his mother-tongue

1 Scope of the section — This section applies only to evidence taken under S 356¹ The authority conferred under this section is personal to the particular officer on whom it is conferred and is in force only while he is in the district or part of the district in which it is conferred² But where such an officer is transferred to another district and he takes down depositions in his own handwriting without authority for that district and commits the accused, the commitment although irregular, is not invalid unless the accused is prejudiced thereby³

Where a Sessions Judge without recording any reasons as to his inability to take down the evidence in his own hand dictates the evidence in open Court to a stenographer who takes it down in shorthand and subsequently transcribes it into a typed record in English and that typed record is signed by the Judge and forms part of the record and not the shorthand notes the procedure constitutes an irregularity so vital as to vitiate the trial⁴

dence under section 356
or section 357

359. (1) Evidence taken under section 356 or section 357 shall not ordinarily be taken down in the form of question and answer, but in the form of a narrative

(2) The Magistrate or Sessions Judge may, in his discretion, take down, or cause to be taken down, any particular question and answer

1 Scope of the section — This section prescribes the mode of recording evidence under ss 356 and 357. It directs that the evidence shall ordinarily be taken down in the form of a narrative. In doing so, the Judge should adhere, as far as possible, to the words actually used either in the question or in the answer given by the witness. The provisions of law cannot be said to be complied with by recording a paraphrase of the evidence given by the witness¹. The ordinary, proper and convenient way of recording the evidence is to take it down in the first person exactly as spoken by the witness².

The Judge is not bound to make verbatim record of any particular question and answer. It is left to the discretion of the Judge, if either side specially requests him to do so.

A Judge may also himself question the witness and record his question and answer under s 165 of the Evidence Act, but this power should be exercised with discretion and within limits as it is unfair to the accused to anticipate or break the thread of his cross-examination³.

2 Recording of questions disallowed. — Sections 356 to 360 do not require that when a Magistrate disallows questions in cross examination he must make a note of this on the record. It has been held that if the Magistrate notes on the record each question that is disallowed the procedure defeats its own object which is to get on with the case, but when a question disallowed is important, or there is a reasonable doubt whether it should not be allowed, it may be useful for the Magistrate to note the question and his reasons for disallowing it. This is, however, entirely a matter for the discretion of the Magistrate⁴. A contrary view has, however, been taken in the undermentioned cases⁵ to the effect that if a question is disallowed on the ground of irrelevancy or on other grounds, the deposition should show what the question is and the reason for disallowing it.

360.† (1) As the evidence of each witness taken under section 356 or section 357 is completed, it shall be read over to him in the presence of the accused, if in attendance, or of his pleader, if he appears by pleader, and shall, if necessary, be corrected

(2) If the witness denies the correctness of any part of the evidence when the same is read over to him, the Magistrate or Sessions Judge may, instead of correcting the evidence, make a memorandum thereon of the objection made to it by the witness, and shall add such remarks as he thinks necessary.

(3) If the evidence is taken down in a language different from that in which it has been given and the witness does not understand the language in which it is taken down, the evidence so taken down shall be interpreted to him in the language in which it was given, or in a language which he understands.

1. Legislative changes — There was no difference between the corresponding sections of the Codes of 1861 and 1872

Difference between the Codes of 1872, 1882 and 1898 —

- (1) The words "or of his agent, when his personal attendance is dispensed with and he appears by agent" were replaced in the 1892 Code by the words "or of his pleader"
- (2) Section 339 of the Code of 1872, provided that the witness "may require his evidence to be interpreted to him" The Code of 1892 and the present Code provide that the evidence "shall be interpreted to him"

2. Scope and applicability of the section. — Sections 356 and 357 prescribe the manner of taking evidence in the cases mentioned therein. This section enacts the procedure to be followed after the evidence is completed. The evidence should be read over to the witness or interpreted to him if it has been taken down in a language which the witness does not understand. Such reading over or interpretation should be done in the presence of the accused or of his pleader if the accused appears by pleader.

The object of the provision is to obtain an accurate record from the witness of what he really means to say and to give him an opportunity of correcting the words which the Magistrate or his clerk has taken down¹. It is not to enable the accused or his advocate to suggest corrections² See also Note 4

3 Shall be read over to the witness — Sub section (1) — Under s 199 of the Code of 1861 it was necessary that a memorandum should be signed and attached to the deposition of each witness to the effect that the evidence was read over to him and that he acknowledged the same to be correct¹ This provision has not been enacted in the present Code It is therefore not imperative though desirable under the present Code that a record be made by the Magistrate that the deposition was read over to the witness in the presence of the accused²

It was held in the undermentioned cases³ that the section is mandatory and not merely directory and the evidence of a witness must be read over to him in the presence of the accused or of his pleader though it may take a considerable time to do so The view that this section is mandatory cannot however be said to be correct after the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in *Abdul Rahman v Emperor*⁴ in which it has been held that the provisions of this section are not absolutely prohibitory and that a non-compliance with the section is curable under s 537 when it is unaccompanied by any probable suggestion of any failure of justice having been thereby occasioned It is not a sufficient compliance with the section to merely hand over to the witness his deposition so that he may read it over himself⁵ It was held in the undermentioned cases⁹ that it would not be a compliance with the section if the evidence is read over to the witness while another witness is being examined, the reason being that the accused cannot at one and the same time listen to the evidence that is being read over and to the evidence of a fresh witness that is being recorded. On this question their Lordships of the Privy Council have held in *Abdul Rahman v. Emperor*⁷ above cited, that although it will be a better course if depositions other than mere formal ones were read over so that the accused or his pleader could hear them and give his undivided attention to them, yet it would be no violation of the provisions of this section if the deposition of one witness is read over while other stages of the case are proceeding, as "the primary object is to fix the witness and to enable him to protect himself against any inaccuracy in the words taken down from his lips"

4. In the presence of the accused or of his pleader.—The evidence must be read over in the presence of the accused, if he is in attendance, or of his pleader. Where, however, there are several accused in the case, the evidence of a witness read over in the presence of the pleader of one only of such accused is not inadmissible in a case of perjury against such witness, merely because it was not read over in the presence of all the other accused or their pleaders¹

It is only where the accused "appears by a pleader" that a reading over of the evidence in the presence of such pleader is sufficient² The words "if he appears by a pleader" cannot be restricted to cases in which a pleader is allowed to represent one accused whose personal attendance has been dispensed with. The natural meaning of the words is that if an accused person has engaged a pleader, who is in attendance, the reading over of the deposition in his presence will be a full compliance with the provisions of this section³

The evidence must be read over only in the presence of the accused or of his pleader. It is not necessary that it should be within their hearing. The reason is that the accused is only entitled to be sure that the evidence has been read over, and that the witness has had an opportunity of correcting the written words. But he is not necessarily entitled to the opportunity of suggesting corrections.⁴

Does this section apply to proceedings under chap XII of the Code? It has been held by a Full Bench of the High Court of Calcutta that the persons proceeded against under that chapter are not "accused" persons, but that the first clause of this section should be read as meaning that the evidence is to be read over in the presence of the accused if there is one and that, therefore, the evidence should be read over to the witness in such proceeding though not in the presence of the persons proceeded against⁵ The High Court of Patna has come to the same conclusion⁶

5 "As the evidence of each witness . . . is completed."—The evidence of each witness must be read over to him immediately after it is completed. The section is not complied with if the deposition is read over at the end of the day after all the witnesses are examined¹ Where a Magistrate examined a number of witnesses and asked them to be in a room and then had the depositions read over to them, it was held that the procedure was illegal and not merely irregular² Again, the section is not complied with if the evidence is read out as each sentence of it is being recorded. It must be read out only after it is *completed*³ But where the evidence is read over to a witness some days after his examination in chief but immediately after his cross examination, it was held that this section was sufficiently complied with⁴

6 "And shall, if necessary, be corrected."—Before a deposition is closed, a witness should be given an opportunity of explaining and correcting any contradictions which it may contain¹

7 Shall be interpreted to the witness—Under the Codes of 1861 and 1872, when the evidence was taken down in a language different from that in which it was given, the witness might require that his evidence should be interpreted to him¹ Under this Code it is obligatory on the Court in all such cases, whether the witness requires it or not, to interpret his evidence to him. It is, however, not necessary to first read out the deposition to the witness in the language in which it is taken and then to interpret it to him. It is sufficient if it is merely interpreted to him²

Should the evidence in such cases be interpreted to the accused? In *Abdul Rahman v King Emperor*³ their Lordships of the Privy Council observed as follows:

it is to be interpreted into their language, while under the former section, when it is read over, it is to be interpreted to the witness in his own language, but there is no provision for its being interpreted to the accused. Thus, if the depositions are taken down in English, and the language of the accused is Hindi, and the language of a witness is Burmese, . . . the depositions will have to be taken by getting the witness's answers in Burmese, having them interpreted to the Court so that they may be taken down in English, and further interpreted to the accused, so that he may understand them, in Hindi. When, however, the deposition comes to be read over, as it will be, in English, it will be interpreted to the witness in Burmese, but not to the accused in Hindi, and if the accused knew neither English nor Burmese, he will be none the wiser."

As to whether a sworn interpreter is necessary for interpreting the evidence to the witness, see S 543, Note 1

8. Non-compliance with the section—Effect of. — It has now been settled by the Privy Council that non compliance with the strict provisions of this section is only an irregularity which is cured by S 537 of the Code in the absence of prejudice¹. Thus, a failure to read over the evidence to the witness would not necessarily vitiate the trial of the accused².

There is a conflict of opinion as to whether the witness can be prosecuted on the basis of evidence, the procedure regarding which has not been followed as laid down in this section. On the one hand, it has been held that non compliance with the section renders the evidence inadmissible under the Evidence Act, that no other evidence can be admitted by virtue of the provisions of S 91 thereof, and that, therefore, a conviction on such

1 Scope of the section — This section enacts that in appealable cases Presidency Magistrates should take down the evidence of witnesses in their own hand, or cause it to be taken down, in open Court to their dictation. They are also required to make a memorandum of the substance of the examination of the accused in such cases. In other cases, i.e., non appealable cases, they need not record any evidence, or even frame a charge.

This section does not apply to cases under S 110, where it becomes necessary to make a reference to the High Court, in regard to the sentence of imprisonment¹

An offence under the Companies Act which is punishable with fine and imprisonment may be tried summarily under this section, unless the Magistrate imposes an appealable sentence, notwithstanding the provisions of S 273 (2) of that Act²

2. Record of evidence in appealable cases — In cases coming under S 262, sub-s (1), i.e., in appealable cases, the Magistrate is bound to record the evidence with his own hand or cause it to be taken down in writing from his dictation in open Court. In doing so, it is the duty of the Magistrate to take note of all the material facts, whether they appear in the examination in chief or in the course of cross examination¹

Before the amendment of 1923, sub-s. (1) applied to cases in which the Magistrate imposed a fine of Rs 200, or imprisonment for a period exceeding six months. The taking of evidence precedes the sentence, and it is on the evidence given that the sentence is based. Therefore, the language was clearly faulty as it is unreasonable to suppose that the Magistrate should make up his mind as to the sentence he would pass, before the evidence was recorded² This defect of language was noticed, and in regard to it, the Select Committee of 1916 observed

"We think that the opening words of sub s (1) of S 362 require amendment As the section stands, it seems to imply that a Presidency Magistrate before he commences his enquiry must make up his mind as to the maximum limit of the sentence he will impose We think that the sub section would read better as amended by us, compare the wording of Section 264"

The amendment made is that in cases in which an appeal lies, the Presidency Magistrate shall either record the evidence himself, or have it recorded It is not clear how the defect of language noticed above has been remedied by the amendment If the section as it stood before the amendment implied that the Magistrate should make up his mind as to the maximum limit of sentence he would pass, the same implication still continues, for, under S 411, only a sentence of imprisonment for more than six months and a fine exceeding Rs 200 are appealable In short, to make up his mind to award an appealable sentence is to make up his mind as to the maximum limit of the sentence he would pass In regard to this criticism, the Select Committee in 1922, observed

"We are inclined to agree with those critics who point out that the re draft proposed in sub s (1) of S 362 does not get rid of the difficulty that a Magistrate has to make up his mind as to the sentence he will impose before he begins trying the case We cannot see how this difficulty can be got rid of, but we think that the amendment proposed has the advantage of bringing the language of this section into conformity with the language of Ss 263 and 264 and we would, therefore, retain this sub clause"

Apart from the uniformity of the language, it is not clear what "advantage" is gained by using language similar to that in Ss 263 and 264 It must in this connection be noted, that the language in S 264 is appropriate and presents no difficulties similar to those in S 362 (1), for a judgment does usually precede the sentence It is the language in S 263 that presents difficulties similar to those in S 362 (1) and in regard to it, it was observed

"It may be difficult for a Magistrate to determine at the initial stage whether he will or will not pass an appealable sentence In such a case the course he has to adopt is to make a memorandum of the evidence of each witness as the examination of the witness proceeds If, on the other hand, even at the initial stage he can make up his mind that in any event the sentence to be passed by him will not be appealable, he need not record the evidence"³

Where the Magistrate finds that he has tried a case without recording the evidence and that a longer sentence than six months ought to be passed, his course is to record the evidence afresh⁴ This happens generally in cases where after he has convicted the accused, he is informed for the first time that the accused is an old criminal with many previous convictions In such cases it has been held that though the prosecution should not inform the Magistrate about previous convictions, they may indicate to the Magistrate that they think that the case is one in which it is desirable that the evidence should be recorded, so as to avoid recording of evidence afresh⁵

3. Record of evidence in non-appealable cases—Sub section (4) was newly introduced in 1923 The section as it stood before 1923 having provided the procedure to be adopted in appealable cases only, there was uncertainty as to the procedure to be followed in non appealable cases¹ It was held by the High Court of Calcutta in the undermentioned case² that it was left to the discretion of the Magistrate to record or not, evidence in such cases and that the High Court felt unable to prescribe a procedure which the law did not render obligatory. In another case³ the same High Court remarked that though the Magistrate was not bound to record evidence in such cases it was desirable that he should keep some record of the statements made by witnesses or that their judgments should indicate what the statements were so that the High Court may judge as a Court of revision of the propriety or legality of the orders passed by them. A similar view was expressed in the undermentioned cases also⁴.

In *Emperor v Harischandra*⁵ the High Court of Bombay held that the Magistrate had a discretion to take evidence or not in such cases, but that such discretion had to be exercised reasonably and not arbitrarily it was observed.

'But the discretion like all discretionary powers should be exercised judicially, in a reasonable spirit and not arbitrarily. For instance, in cases of petty offences, such as nuisances or what are called in police parlance 'morning cases,' there may be no necessity to record any evidence. But in a case of this kind, where an educated man holding a comparatively respectable status in life is charged with an offence reflecting on his character and serious allegations are levelled against him, there ought to have been some record of evidence to enable him in a case of conviction to come up to this Court in revision and satisfy it that the conviction is wrong''

This view was adopted by the same High Court in the undermentioned cases⁶ which arose after the introduction of sub s (4) of this section. In D Souza v Emperor,⁷ however, the said view was dissented from. Beaumont, C J observed as follows.

Section 362 is perfectly plain it says that in cases which are not appealable, it shall not be necessary for a Presidency Magistrate to record the evidence. There is no distinction drawn between what the learned Judges refer to as 'morning cases' and any other cases. Nor is any distinction drawn between charges against people occupying a respectable status in life and people who occupy some other status. Nor in terms has any discretion been conferred upon the Magistrate. It is no doubt true that in one sense he has a discretion, because it is not illegal for him to record evidence if he likes to do so. But his right to refuse to record evidence is, in my opinion, absolute, and as long as the case falls within the cases excepted under s 362, sub s (4), the Magistrate is not bound to record the evidence, and this Court has no jurisdiction to require him to do what the Statute says it is not necessary for him to do. If he likes to record the evidence, that is another matter and probably if he was hearing a case which involved a question of serious consequence to the accused, and the accused asked him to make a record of those portions of the evidence on which he wished to rely on an application in revision, the Magistrate would, in a proper case, comply with that request. But in my opinion, the exercise of any such discretion would be ex gratia, and not subject to review in this Court."

The view expressed in D'Souza's case has been approved by a Full Bench of that High Court in the undermentioned case⁸.

4 Mode of recording evidence — Under sub s. (2) it is required that the evidence shall ordinarily be recorded in the form of a narrative, but that the Magistrate may, in his discretion, take down any particular question or answer. But mere irregularities in the mode of recording evidence will not, unless failure of justice has been occasioned thereby, vitiate the trial. Thus, where a Presidency Magistrate recorded certain portions of the depositions of some of the witnesses which were of a more or less formal nature in the form of indirect narration as "P W 4 speaks to the identification by P W. 1 of some of the jewels," and "P W 3 proves his signature to the search lists," it was held that the trial was not vitiated, as this mode of recording evidence occasioned no failure of justice¹. But where in recording the examination in chief of two witnesses the Magistrate merely recorded the words "corroborates P W 1," it was held that what is required is not merely the opinion of the Magistrate regarding the evidence given by the witnesses but a correct record of the evidence given by them, that the Magistrate had failed to follow the directions given by this section so far as these witnesses were concerned and that the conviction could not be upheld².

5 Memorandum of the substance of the examination of the accused. — Sub section (2A) which was newly added in 1923 requires the Presidency Magistrates to record the substance of the examination of the accused in appealable cases. Simultaneous with the introduction of this sub section, sub s (4) of S 364 was amended so as to make the provisions of S 364 as to the recording of the examination of the accused inapplicable to Presidency Magistrates in appealable cases. Thus, in appealable cases Presidency Magistrates need only make a memorandum of the examination of the accused and are not required to take down the examination of the accused in the manner provided in S 364. As to why this new sub section was introduced, the Select Committee say:

"In order to meet difficulties that have arisen, we have introduced a sub s (2A) laying down that Presidency Magistrates, in cases subject to appeal, shall make a memorandum of the substance of the examination of the accused, "

There is no provision as to the mode of recording the examination of the accused in non appealable cases, which are now severely left alone confined to the protection that S 370, by its own terms, would afford. Thus in non appealable cases the only record of the examination of the accused is what is filled up under cl (f) of S 370. As to the manner of filling up of this column, however, S 370 is silent and it has been held that in a case where the accused, both at the time he took the plea and when he was examined, denied that he committed the offence, the entry 'denies' is sufficient¹.

6. Framing of charges by Presidency Magistrates — Sub section (4) which has been newly added relieves Presidency Magistrates from the duty of framing charges in non appealable cases. But in appealable cases where charges have to be framed under S 254, the Presidency Magistrates are bound to frame charges¹. Thus to try an accused for an offence punishable under S 420/75 of the Penal Code, without framing a charge, is a defect of procedure, for S 254 applies to Presidency Magistrates and it is mandatory.

simple and depends on the credit which attaches to one or other of conflicting witnesses⁶ or where the evidence is all oral and its credibility is a matter of opinion,⁷ the opinion of the Magistrate who heard and saw the witnesses is not lightly set aside and it may even be said that it is generally taken as conclusive. Thus, where a Sessions Judge of experience stated that the demeanour of the eye witnesses was evasive, that they inspired him with no confidence and no man could be convicted on their testimony, the appellate Court could not and would not accept the evidence of those eye witnesses as true, unless the appellate Court is assured in the most positive and convincing manner that the criticism of the Sessions Judge was not justified.⁸ The High Court was prepared to accept the evidence of a girl of six years who was the only eye witness to the murder as the Sessions Judge stated that "her evidence was given without hesitation and without the slightest suggestion of tutoring or anything of that sort."⁹ The demeanour of witnesses whilst under examination is thus very important on the question of credibility of oral evidence and hence the Magistrate or the Sessions Judge, as the case may be, is required by this section to record such remarks as he thinks material regarding the demeanour of the witnesses, so that the appellate Court might take these remarks into consideration in assessing the value to be attached to the oral evidence adduced in the case.

While the appellate Court should be guided by the remarks made by Magistrates about the demeanour of the witnesses, yet it is bound to, independently, consider the facts of the case.¹⁰ As a matter of fact, where the opinion of the lower Court is based not so much on the demeanour of the witness as on the inherent improbabilities of the story deposed to,¹¹ or the supposed discrepancies in the case as put forward by a party,¹² the appellate Court is in as good a position as the Magistrate, Sessions Judge or the trial Court to note the improbabilities or the discrepancies, and hence is not very much bound by the opinion of the trial Court.

Unsatisfactory demeanour, however, is not always a sure indication of falsehood. It has been said that it is dangerous to reject on the ground of unsatisfactory demeanour statements in themselves probable made under the sanction of an oath by witnesses of good reputation.¹³

Nor is good or satisfactory demeanour always a real test of truth. A good demeanour on the part of an accomplice cannot be sufficient corroboration of his evidence. Impressions as to demeanour of an accomplice "are too ephemeral in their character to take the place of corroboration in material particulars to make the testimony of an accomplice worthy of credit."¹⁴

2 Remarks on substance of deposition of witness — A Magistrate is not authorized under this section to record any remarks about the credibility or the substance of the deposition of the witness until the whole evidence has been taken.¹ The reason is that this will amount to prejudging the case and the parties are entitled to claim that he shall not do so until the case has been fully and finally presented to the Magistrate by the parties or their counsel after the entire evidence has been recorded.² Where a Magistrate while recording the evidence of a witness, made a note not only as to his demeanour but also that he had not spoken the truth, it was held that there was sufficient ground for transfer of the case to some other Magistrate.³

1 Scope and applicability of the section — This section prescribes the manner in which the examination of an accused person (under S 342) is to be recorded¹

Section 364 — Note 1

- 1 (02) 4 Bom LR 461 (46^o) Emperor v Nagar Purohitam

 [See also (75) 23 Suth WR Cr 16 (16) Queen v Jelco]

This is not applicable to the following cases

- (1) Where the person examined is not an accused person² e.g. a person examined under S. 302 of the Code³
- (2) Where the accused is not examined at all and a note is made by the Magistrate that the accused is unwilling to be examined and on that ground is not examined⁴
- (3) Where the accused is examined under S. 267 (summary trial)⁵ or in the course of a trial held by a Presidency Magistrate⁶ (see sub s. (4))

In virtue of sub s. (2) of S. 364 a confession recorded under that section is to be recorded in the manner prescribed by this section⁶ See also the undermentioned cases⁷

2 Record of examination should be full — The whole examination of an accused person including every question put to him and every answer given by him must be recorded in full¹ As far as possible the record should be made in the exact words used by him² The section does not except even irrelevant questions from being taken down The Magistrate or Court is responsible for putting such questions, but if they are put they must be recorded as also the answers given³ Even where the accused gives an answer, but says that it should not be taken down in his statement the Magistrate should record it under this section⁴

3 Language of the record.—The examination of an accused person should be taken down in the language in which the person is examined, the object being to represent the very words and expressions used so as to ensure accuracy and prevent misrepresentation or misconstruction of what was said¹ If, however, such a record is not practicable, the law directs that the statement or confession shall be recorded in the language of the Court or in English²

As to the effect of non compliance with this rule with regard to the record of confessions, see Notes on S 533

4. "Shall be shown or read to him or . . . interpreted to him"—It is obligatory on the Court to show or read the record of the statements of an accused person to him or to have it interpreted to him if it is in a language not understood by him, so that he might be assured that his words have been correctly taken down and, if necessary, have it corrected¹

In the undermentioned case² the statement of the accused was not read over to him and his signature taken immediately after the close of the prosecution but when this was brought to the notice of the Magistrate the accused was given an opportunity of making a further statement although it was not asserted that the original statement was not correct It was held that the trial could not be impeached as being illegal See also Notes on S 342

5 "To explain or add to his answers."—When the record of an examination of an accused person is shown or read over to him, he is entitled to explain or add to his answers,¹ so that the whole shall be made conformable to what the accused declares to be the truth.² It is the statement as finally declared by him to be true that is to be accepted as representing his statement.³

6 The record shall be signed — The record of the examination of an accused must be signed both by the accused and by the Magistrate or Judge making the record.

The signature of the accused person to a statement should be made in the immediate presence of the Magistrate himself. To take a signature in an adjoining room before a clerk and not in the Magistrate's immediate presence is not a proper compliance with the provisions of the section.⁴

As to the effect of refusal by the accused to sign see S 373 and notes thereon.

7 'Shall certify under his own hand' — The certificate need not be in the handwriting of the Magistrate or Judge. It is sufficient if it is under his hand only, i.e. signed by him.⁵ When duly recorded the certificate is sufficient prima facie proof of such examination and it is to be presumed that the proceedings were regular.⁶

8 Sub section (3) — The examination need not be taken down in the Magistrate's own handwriting. It is enough if it is taken down in his presence and hearing.⁷ In such cases however the Magistrate is bound to make a memorandum of the examination in his own hand and annex it to the record.

9 Sub section (4) — Sub section (4) provides that this section shall not apply to two classes of cases —

(1) Cases coming under S 263 i.e. cases tried summarily.⁸

(2) Cases tried by a Presidency Magistrate.

Before the amendment of the Code in 1923 the procedure as to the recording of an examination of the accused applied to all Magistrates including Presidency Magistrates and it was held that it was obligatory upon the Presidency Magistrates to record the examination of the accused in the manner provided by the section, but that it was desirable that the Legislature should relieve the Presidency Magistrates altogether from this obligation.⁹ The amending Acts of 1923 gave effect to this view and omitted the words 'unless he is a Presidency Magistrate' in subs (3) and added the words 'or in the course of a trial held by a Presidency Magistrate' in subs (4) and subs (2A) to S 362, in order 'to prepared and delivered by the presiding officer in the absence of the other members of the Bench is not a proper judgment³

4 Judgment must be pronounced — The section specifically requires that every judgment ought to be pronounced by Court in accordance with the section¹ Till then it is inoperative as a judgment and is nothing more than the private expression of an opinion by the Judge which can be changed and altered² See also S 350 Note 6.

5 Substance of judgment to be explained — It is not obligatory on the Court to pronounce the whole of the judgment. It is enough if the substance of such judgment is explained. Where however, the prosecution or the defence requests the Court to read the whole of the judgment the presiding officer should comply with the request.

6 Effect of loss of records — Where a portion of the material records in a case is lost it is open to the Judge to re write the judgment from memory and from the materials before him and place it on the record¹

7 "In open Court" — The judgment should be ordinarily pronounced in open Court. Where however a judgment is pronounced by a Magistrate in his private house instead of in the usual court hall by reason of his illness the judgment is not necessarily illegal and will not be set aside in the absence of proof of prejudice¹

8 Time of pronouncing judgment — The judgment should be pronounced only after the closing of the case. If pronounced before it is a nullity¹. But there should be no unreasonable delay in pronouncing the judgment after the closing of the case. Such delay is not only unjust to the accused as it prevents them from appealing against the sentence but is also opposed to the general principles of law²

9 Pronouncing predecessor's judgment — See Note 6 on Sect on 350

10 Presence of accused when pronouncing judgment—Sub section (2) — Where the accused was not required to attend to hear the judgment delivered and could not be so required as he had absconded before judgment it was held by the High Court of Lahore that the judgment pronounced in his absence was wholly illegal and should be set aside¹ See also the undermentioned case² Where an accused person absconded before judgment and on his re-arrest, the Magistrate re-pronounced the judgment which he had pronounced in his absence, it was held that the defect was one which was cured under s 537³ It has been seen in Note 10 on s 205 that where the accused is convicted and the sentence is not one of fine only, the Court must, under sub s (2) of this section, direct the personal attendance of the accused for hearing the judgment

11 Sentence or release to be after judgment — A sentence in the case of conviction, or a direction to set the accused at liberty in the case of an acquittal can only follow the judgment and not precede it A breach of this rule is however, only an irregularity which can be cured under the provisions of s 537¹ The High Court of Patna has however, in the undermentioned case² held that pronouncing judgment before completing the judgment makes the sentence illegal The decision follows the view expressed in Queen Empress v Har Gobind,³ which has been explained in later decisions of the Allahabad High Court See Section 537, Note 12

1 Object and applicability of the section — As has been already mentioned in Note 1 on S 366 the provisions of this section also are based upon good and substantial grounds of public policy¹

This section applies to such judgments as are referred to in S 366 that is to say, to judgments in trials.¹ It does not apply to orders on petitions.² It has been held by the Chief Court of Oudh that this section has no application to appeals.⁴ This view it is submitted is not correct as it goes against the express provisions of S 421. See also S 424 and Notes thereon.

As to whether the section applies to orders under Ss 118 and 123 see Note 17.

1a Judgment—Meaning of—The word judgment has not been defined in this Code. The wording of S 366 as well as this section shows that the word judgment means a decision in a trial which decides a case finally so far as the Court trying the case is concerned and terminating in either a conviction or acquittal of the accused.¹ Thus an order of discharge is not a final order and is not therefore a judgment within the meaning of the section.² For further discussion see Notes 2 and 3 on S 366. See also the undermentioned cases.³

2 Language of judgment—The judgment should be written in the language of the Court or in English.¹ Writing the judgment in any other language is however, only an irregularity which can be cured by the provisions of S 537.²

3 "Written by the presiding officer"—Prior to the amendment in 1923 this section provided that the judgment must be written by the presiding officer. It was therefore held that the judgment should be written by the Court itself and not by some body else to the dictation of the officer.¹ The amendment of 1923 now allows such a procedure.

Where in the case of a trial by a Bench of Magistrates the President of the Bench is in a minority as to conviction or acquittal the judgment should be written by some member of the majority.² See also Notes 2 and 3 on S 265.

4 Contents of judgment—General—This section requires that a judgment must contain the points for determination, the decision thereon and the reasons for the

1 Object and applicability of the section — As has been already mentioned in Note 1 on S 366, the provisions of this section also are based upon good and substantial grounds of public policy¹

and cannot merely adopt the opinion of the Magistrate by whom the case was forwarded⁷

It is undesirable to make a document, prepared by a party, part of a judgment unless the Court has checked the document and found it to be correct⁸

A judgment should specifically set forth facts and orders necessary to give authority to the Court in the particular case⁹

A judgment should not be unnecessarily long¹⁰ But it should be written in such a way that it would be easy to summarily dismiss an appeal against it on a perusal of the judgment alone¹¹

In a trial with the aid of assessors merely recording a finding on facts and evidence as explained to the assessors in summing up the evidence to them is not sufficient compliance with the section¹²

5 Points for determination. — This section lays down that every judgment must contain the point or points for determination To ascertain and define distinctly these points is the very ground stone of a sound and stable judgment¹ A judgment which does not set forth the points for determination is defective²

6 "Decision thereon" — Appreciation of evidence — Though the rules of evidence are the same in civil and criminal proceedings there is always a marked difference between the effect and appreciation of evidence in the two cases In civil cases a mere preponderance of probability or greater probative value is sufficient to warrant a conclusion, while in criminal cases before the accused can be convicted, there should be such a moral certainty of his guilt as convinces the mind of the tribunal as reasonable men, beyond the possibility of doubt or suspicion¹ Thus it is primarily the duty of the decision¹ The object of these provisions is that a Criminal Court should consider the case before it in all its bearings and should on such consideration arrive at definite conclusions after considering the evidence in the case² Thus a judgment which consists of a few notes on the arguments of the counsel and a somewhat vague conclusion is no judgment at all³ But the section does not lay down any particular form which a judgment must take and a failure to strictly conform to the provisions of this section would be a mere irregularity curable under S 537 if it can be gathered from the body of the judgment itself that there has been substantial compliance with the provisions of the section⁴

Where there are separate trials separate judgments must be recorded Where however, two cases are closely connected together, the Court may write a detailed judgment containing a complete recital of the facts in the more important of the two cases and it would not be objectionable to refer to such recital in the separate judgment recorded in the less important case At the same time the Court should always be careful to see that evidence which is only admissible in one of the two cases is not referred to or put forward as a reason for a conviction or acquittal in the other case in which it is not relevant⁵

A judgment once delivered cannot be supplemented by means of an explanation furnished to the superior Court⁶

When a case is forwarded to a superior Magistrate under S 349 with the opinion of the forwarding Magistrate, the superior Magistrate must write an independent judgment

The standard of proof required in criminal cases does not vary with the magnitude or enormity of the crime²⁶ though it is usual and prudent to observe the rule 'the fouler the crime is, the clearer and plainer ought the proof of it to be'²⁷ In cases based on circumstantial evidence such evidence should be so strong as to point very clearly to the guilt of the accused²⁸ It is of utmost importance in such cases that in order to justify an inference of guilt the inculpatory facts should be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt²⁹ Thus where the action of the accused is open to two constructions one criminal

As to what constitutes proof of guilt of an accused person in any case depends upon the bundle of facts which serve to convince the Court of the prosecution story and of the charges against the accused. Absolute certainty amounting to a demonstration of guilt can seldom be had and it must only be judged whether, in the circumstances of each particular case the degree of probability is so high as to justify one in regarding it as certainty and in acting accordingly³¹. Even in the case of parties and witnesses the Court should not make any unfounded and unnecessary observations which are calculated to injure their reputation or wound their feelings, especially when the person attacked has had no opportunity of defending himself.² While, on the one hand, Courts are at liberty to discuss the conduct of the persons before them, either as parties or witnesses, untrammelled by any considerations, on the other hand, they are not permitted to travel beyond the record and are bound to exercise due restraint on the language employed by them.³ Similarly, unfounded remarks against the conduct of counsel should not find a place in the judgment.⁴

Though a humorous judgment is not necessarily a bad judgment,⁵ facetious comments which do not contribute to the disposal of the case and which are likely to wound the feelings of persons should be avoided.⁶

9. Offence to be specified—It is necessary that the judgment should distinctly specify the offence or offences of which the accused is convicted.¹ This section also requires that where the offence is under the Penal Code or under any other law, the section of the Act under which the accused is convicted should be stated.²

Where a Judge convicts the accused on a charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he should state in his judgment under which of the exceptions in S 300 of the Penal Code the case falls.³

10. "Punishment to which he is sentenced."—Where a Court finds an accused person guilty, it is bound to pass some sentence.¹ This section shows that the sentence is part of the judgment² and a Court has, therefore, no power to postpone the passing of the sentence to some future date once it convicts the accused.³

It is the duty of a Court, pronouncing a sentence, to define precisely the nature of the sentence intended to be passed, the sentence ought to be self contained, so that the functionary who has to execute it should have nothing to do but to obey the directions given therein without making an inquiry on his own account⁴. Thus, a direction in a sentence that the accused should be detained in a reformatory school for a period of five years unless he should sooner attain the age of eighteen years would not be a legal sentence, as it would leave to the officer in charge of the school to determine when the sentence would expire, otherwise than by reference to the warrant⁵.

It has been held that an order of disqualification for holding a driving licence passed under S 17 (1) of the Motor Vehicles Act is not such a punishment as is required to be specified under this section⁶.

11. "Shall be dated and signed by the presiding officer . . . at the time of pronouncing it" — The judgment must be dated and signed by the presiding officer,¹ at the time of pronouncing it in open Court².

The word 'sign' has not been defined in this Code. It has been held to mean the "writing of the name of the person who is the signatory, so that it may convey a distinct idea to others that the writing indicates a particular individual whose signature it purports to be"³. Merely putting the initials of the presiding officer has been held not to amount to signing the judgment within the meaning of this section.⁴ The signature should be made with a pen and ink and not with a stamp⁵.

The omission to date and sign a judgment by the presiding officer is, however, only an irregularity covered by S 537 and will not render the judgment void⁶. Similarly, the affixing of a signature with a stamp instead of with pen and ink is merely an irregularity⁷.

Where a case was heard by only three Magistrates of a Bench, but the judgment was signed by seven, it was held that this was an illegality⁸. As to judgments by a Bench of Magistrates, see S 350A and Notes thereon.

As to whether a judgment written by a Magistrate can be delivered by his successor, see S 350, Note 6.

which of two sections or which of two parts of the same section applies¹ Such a judgment in the alternative can be passed only in cases in which not the facts but the application of the law to the facts is doubtful² See also Note 1 on S 236

Where a judgment does not state in express terms that the Court is in doubt under which of two sections or which of two parts of the same section the offence falls as required by this section it is only an irregularity which will not vitiate the judgment³

13 Judgment in cases of acquittal — Where the accused is acquitted, the judgment should state what the offences are of which he is acquitted and should direct that he be set at liberty¹ An order sheet cannot be a substitute for the judgment and a mention of acquittal in it is not sufficient compliance with the provisions of sub section (4)² When a verdict of not guilty is recorded the Court should not in its judgment make any suggestion against the accused, except that of establishing his innocence³ See also Note 8

As soon as a judgment of acquittal is pronounced the accused is entitled to be discharged from custody and his further detention is illegal and no formal warrant of release addressed by the Court to the superintendent of the jail is necessary⁴

14 Judgment in capital cases—Sub section (5) —This sub section requires that if an accused person is convicted of an offence punishable with death and the Court sentences him to any punishment other than death it shall, in its judgment state the reasons why the sentence of death was not passed¹ It therefore, contemplates sentences of death in capital cases as the ordinary rule and sentences of transportation for life as the exception Before passing the lesser sentence the Judge should find that there are really extenuating circumstances not merely an absence of aggravating circumstances, it is not for the Judge to ask himself whether there are reasons for imposing the penalty of death but whether there are reasons for abstaining from doing so² But if the Judge is in doubt whether a sentence of death or a sentence other than death should be passed, the doubt, like all other doubts should result in favour of the accused³

This section, however does not indicate what reasons should be considered sufficient for not passing a sentence of death in a capital case⁴ Such reasons must be in accordance with established legal principles⁵

15 Trial by jury — Heads of charge to the jury — Proviso — Where the case is tried by jury the Judge is not bound to write a judgment, it is enough if he records the heads of the charge to the jury As the law allows an appeal in cases of trial by jury on the ground of misdirection in the charge to the jury, the Judge should record the heads of the charge in such a form as to enable the Court of appeal to judge whether the facts and circumstances of the case were properly placed before the jury and the law correctly explained to them¹ It is not sufficient for the Judge merely to state in his record

Final orders — Cannot be reviewed — Examples See Note 2

Inherent power of High Court — Power to review its own order not included See Note 6

Interlocutory orders — Can be re-considered — Examples See Note 2

Judgment — Final only after pronouncing and signing See Note 3

Judgment—Means decision in a trial See Note 2

Principle — Not applicable to administrative or ministerial orders See Note 2

Revision application in High Court—Dismissal for default — Fresh application — Whether can be entertained See Note 5

1 Legislative changes — There was no provision corresponding to this section in the Code of 1861. Section 464 of the Code of 1872 provided that a judgment or final order cannot be altered or reviewed by the Court giving such judgment or order.

Changes made by Codes of 1882 and 1898 —

(1) Section 369 of the Code of 1882 excluded High Courts from the purview of this section (See Note 6)

(2) The words 'except as provided in sections 395 and 481 or to correct a clerical error' were introduced

Changes made in 1923 —

The words "Save as otherwise provided" such High Court, no Court' were substituted for the words "No Court other than a High Court", and the words "as provided in Ss. 395 and 481, or" occurring after the word "except" were omitted by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923 (See Note 6)

2 Scope of the section — It is a universal principle of law that, when a matter has been finally disposed of by a Court, the Court is, in the absence of a direct statutory provision, functus officio and cannot entertain a fresh prayer for the same relief unless and until the previous order of final disposal has been set aside (See Note 19 on S 435). This section is based on this principle. The judgment of a Criminal Court is final, as far as that Court is concerned, and, on signing and pronouncing it, such Court becomes functus officio and has, therefore, no power to review, override, alter or interfere with the judgment in any manner except —

(1) where it is otherwise provided by the Code or by any other law for the time being in force (see Note 6), or

(2) for the purpose of correcting clerical errors¹

An order of discharge not amounting to an acquittal,¹⁶ or an order of dismissal under S 203 of the Code,¹⁷ or an order cancelling a notice under S 107 of the Code, for the absence of the complainant,¹⁸ is not a final order and can be reconsidered by the Court.

The general principle abovementioned has no application to administrative or ministerial orders.¹⁹

3. Judgment when final. — A judgment of a criminal Court becomes final only after it is pronounced and signed.¹ A judgment, therefore, which though signed has not been pronounced is inoperative and incomplete and the Judge has power to alter or vary it before pronouncing it.² Similarly, where the Magistrate is pronouncing a judgment before signing it, and his attention is drawn to certain matters in it showing an error or mistake therein, he has ample powers to correct any mistake or alter the judgment before signing it.³ Under the rules of the Allahabad High Court, a judgment becomes final only after it is sealed and therefore the High Court has power to alter or add to its judgment before it is actually sealed.⁴ See also the case cited below.⁵

A Division Bench of the Chief Court of Oudh has, however, held that the sealing of the judgment is not what creates finality in the judgment and that it is only a ministerial act⁶ though it is the practice of the Court that judgments in criminal appeals and revisions are sealed. According to the practice of the Bombay High Court in its ordinary original criminal jurisdiction no judgment nor any other pronouncement of its decision is signed until the warrant is signed by the presiding Judge and therefore before signing the warrant the Court can alter or review its sentence, though already pronounced.⁷

A judgment within the meaning of this section should be taken to mean and refer only to the judicial act of the Court in finally disposing of the case and must refer to and indicate only the order of the Court when it is read out and signed by the Judge. It does not refer to any formal orders which are contemplated to be drawn up and issued⁸ in consequence by a ministerial officer of the Court. Such ministerial orders which are issued may be corrected or altered.⁹ See also Section 350, Note 6.

4 "Alter or review the same"—It has been seen in note 2 that the Court after signing and pronouncing its judgment becomes functus officio and has no power thereafter to add to or alter such judgment in any manner. Any such alteration or addition if made would be without jurisdiction and a nullity.¹ Thus, the following alterations and additions are illegal:

(1) The addition of an explanatory note to the judgment after it is pronounced.²

(2) Subsequent sentence under s 75 Penal Code (enhancing punishment on account of a previous conviction) after accused has already been convicted and sentenced.³

(3) The enhancement of the sentence passed even though it be at the request of the accused himself in order to make his case appealable⁴

(4) The addition of a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine even though it had been omitted to be passed by oversight⁵

In the last mentioned case the Court can only report the matter to the High Court under S 438⁶. Even in cases where the Court finds that the conviction and sentence passed by it are illegal⁷ or where the innocence of the accused is discovered from facts which come to light subsequent to the conviction and sentence passed by the Court⁸ the only remedy would be to report the matter to the High Court under S 438 or to refer the matter to the Provincial Government for necessary action under chapter XXIX and not to review or re consider the matter itself. Similarly, where a mistake is pointed out to the Magistrate subsequent to his passing an order under S 488 he cannot amend the order but can only submit the proceedings to the Sessions Judge for submission to the High Court for rectification⁹.

This rule against review of judgments applies only to cases where the portion of the judgment or order sought to be reviewed forms an integral part of the judgment which cannot be treated as separate and distinct from such judgment¹⁰. Where however the judgment contains damaging observations against a witness who at the time had no opportunity of explaining or defending himself it has been held that the Judge has power to re consider that portion of it for the purpose of expunging such observations if thereby the judgment against the accused is not affected reviewed or varied¹¹. Similarly where the Magistrate accidentally omits to pass an order regarding the disposal of property at the time of the judgment he or his successor can subsequently pass an order for its disposal as such an addition is not an alteration of the judgment¹². A judgment cannot be said to be altered within the meaning of this section in the following cases

(1) Where the Sessions Judge sentences the accused to transportation in ignorance of the fact that the accused is already serving a sentence of imprisonment and after becoming aware of it directs that the sentence of transportation should take effect immediately¹³

(2) Where the Court adds a direction as to costs in a proceeding under S 135¹⁴

5 Power of High Court to review its judgment—Before the amendment of 1923 the section ran as follows

No Court other than a High Court when it has signed its judgment shall alter or review the same except as provided in ss 395 and 484 or to correct a clerical error

The question arose whether the express negation of the power of review in respect of criminal tribunals other than the High Court had the effect of conferring upon the High Court such a power by implication. It was held in a series of decisions that the exclusion of judgments of the High Court from the purview of the section could not in the absence of any provision expressly conferring the power be read as conferring upon the High Court any such power¹ and that the Legislature in thus excluding High Courts from the purview of that section had in mind s 434 and the Letters Patent which provide for review of judgments where questions of law are reserved for consideration²

The section has been amended in order to give effect to the view above mentioned³. Where the High Court has pronounced its judgment and signed it, it becomes functus officio and neither the Judge, who passed the judgment nor any other Bench of the High Court has any power to review re-consider or alter it except for correcting a clerical error⁴ whether the judgment was passed in revision,⁵ or on

(3) The enhancement of the sentence passed, even though it be at the request of the accused himself in order to make his case appealable ⁴

(4) The addition of a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine even though it had been omitted to be passed by oversight ⁵

In the last mentioned case the Court can only report the matter to the High Court under s 438 ⁶ Even in cases where the Court finds that the conviction and sentence passed by it are illegal ⁷ or where the innocence of the accused is discovered from facts which come to light subsequent to the conviction and sentence passed by the Court ⁸ the only remedy would be to report the matter to the High Court under s 438 or to refer the matter to the Provincial Government for necessary action under chapter XXIX and not to review or re consider the matter itself Similarly, where a mistake is pointed out to the Magistrate subsequent to his passing an order under s 488 he cannot amend the order but can only submit the proceedings to the Sessions Judge for submission to the High Court for rectification ⁹

This rule against review of judgments applies only to cases where the portion of the judgment or order sought to be reviewed forms an integral part of the judgment which cannot be treated as separate and distinct from such judgment ¹⁰ Where however the judgment contains damaging observations against a witness who at the time had no opportunity of explaining or defending himself, it has been held that the Judge has power to re consider that portion of it for the purpose of expunging such observations if thereby the judgment against the accused is not affected, reviewed or varied ¹¹ Similarly where the Magistrate accidentally omits to pass an order regarding the disposal of property at the time of the judgment, he or his successor can subsequently pass an order for its disposal as such an addition is not an alteration of the judgment ¹² A judgment cannot be said to be altered within the meaning of this section in the following cases

(1) Where the Sessions Judge sentences the accused to transportation in ignorance of effect immediately

(2) Where the Court adds a direction as to costs in a proceeding under s. 145 ¹⁴

6 "Save as otherwise provided by this Code" — The provisions of this section should be read as subject to any provision of the Code which provides specifically for a review of judgment. The following provisions admit of review of judgments in particular cases

- (1) Section 395 providing for review of the sentence of whipping
- (2) Section 432 providing for review of a case where questions of law are referred for decision by the High Court.
- (3) Section 484 providing for review of judgment in contempt cases where the accused tenders an apology¹
- (4) Section 436 providing for a District Magistrate making further inquiry himself in respect of an order passed by himself²
- (5) Section 489 (2) providing for cancellation or variation of an order passed under Section 498³
- (6) Judgments and orders passed by an appellate Court are final except in cases provided for in chapter XXXII. See S 430. As to whether S 430 which saves the right of revision in respect of appellate orders has application to orders of appeal passed by the High Court itself, see S 439 Note 32

The inherent powers of the High Court as stated in S 561A, do not include the power to review an order made by the High Court in its criminal jurisdiction. This section merely declares that such inherent powers as the Court may possess shall not be deemed to be limited or affected by anything contained in the Code. It does not confer on the Court any new powers such as any power to review or alter orders passed by itself⁴ appeal,⁶ or on a reference to it under S 432 or S 431,⁷ or S 433,⁸ or in its original criminal jurisdiction

Where the High Court dismisses a criminal revision application for default or where it passes an order to the prejudice of a party without providing such party an opportunity for being heard in support of his case, has the High Court power to restore the case and hear the matter again on its merits? The answer to this question depends upon the nature of the order passed by the Court. The powers of revision vested in the High Court under S 439 can only be exercised at the discretion of the Court if the circumstances require it and ordinarily no party has a right to be heard in support of his case.⁹ But where such a right is expressly given to the accused as under sub s (2) to S 439 the High Court is bound to provide an opportunity to the accused before passing any order to his prejudice. It has therefore, been held that where an order is passed to the prejudice of an accused and by mistake or inadvertence, no opportunity had been given to him to be heard in his defence, such an order being without jurisdiction is not a judgment contemplated by this section and that the High Court has power to entertain a fresh revision application to re consider the matter.¹⁰ Where, however, the sentence against an accused is reduced without notice to the Crown the Court has no power to re consider the matter as the Crown has no right to be heard in the matter of sentence.¹¹ In all other cases where a criminal revision application is dismissed for default of the petitioner the High Court has no right to entertain a fresh application for the same relief.¹² It has however been held by the High Courts of Lahore,¹³ Rangoon¹⁴ and Calcutta¹⁵ that even in such cases the High Court has power to set aside the order of dismissal as an order of dismissal for default is not a judgment (which is presumably a judgment on merits) contemplated by this section. Synopsis

- 1 Scope of the section
- 2 Record of particulars
- 3 Plea and examination of the accused — Clause (f)
- 4 Recording reasons — Clause (i)
- 5 Imprisonment

NOTE to the Synopsis See the Notes indicated for the following topics

Imprisonment — Refers only to substantial sentence See Note 5

Magistrate—Referring to document on record—No serious object on See Note 4

Omission to record particulars—Only irregularity See Note 2

Reasons—To be recorded briefly—Omission to do so not seriously prejudicing accused—Irregularity cured by S 537 See Note 4

Section — No application to proceedings under Workman's Breach of Contract Act See Note 1

1 Scope of the section — This section is an exception to S 367 and enacts that a Presidency Magistrate shall record the particulars specified instead of recording judgment as provided by S 367¹ This section has no application to proceedings started under S 2 subs (1) and S 3 of the Workman's Breach of Contract Act 1859²

2 Record of particulars — The direction to record particulars should be strictly followed¹ The various particulars should be recorded in the form prescribed by the various High Courts² Where however all the important particulars have been recorded the omission to record all the particulars in the form prescribed is only an irregularity which can be cured under S 537³

3 Plea and examination of the accused—Clause (f) — The words "if any" in clause (f) do not control the provisions of S 342 under which the Magistrate is bound to record the examination of the accused¹ No hard and fast rule is contemplated as to how the plea and examination of the accused are to be recorded the entry therefore "denies" in the column was held sufficient compliance with the section where when the plea was taken and the accused was examined he merely denied having committed the offence²

As to the effect of non compliance with the clause see S 537 Note 12

for the conviction. It is enough if the reasons are briefly stated,¹ but it should be done in such a manner that the High Court may in revision be in a position to judge whether there were sufficient materials before the Magistrate to support the conviction.² Thus, a mere statement that the offence is proved,³ or that the accused has no defence to make,⁴ or that the Magistrate believes the prosecution witnesses,⁵ is not a compliance with the provisions of the section where however, the omission to record the reasons has not seriously prejudiced the accused,⁶ as where the trying Magistrate has made a record of the evidence and other important matters and the records are made available to the Court,⁷ the irregularity will be cured under S 537. Section 411 further enables the Magistrate to submit a statement of reasons where the records are called for by the High Court (under S 435) even in cases where no reasons are recorded at all by the Presidency Magistrate in his judgment. But where the conviction is passed without proper reasons therefor, on evidence of which no record is taken and which is, therefore, not available to the High Court, the omission to record the reasons in such cases is a grave irregularity which will be a sufficient ground for interference by the High Court.⁸ See also section 537, Note 12.

The Presidency Magistrate is not bound to give any statement of reasons in case he inflicts a fine of less than Rs. 200 but if he chooses to write a judgment in such a case it is his duty to give his findings on the facts proved.⁹

5 "Imprisonment"—The word imprisonment contemplated by this section refers to the substantive sentence passed, it does not include the sentence of imprisonment ordered in default of payment of fine.¹

OF THE SUBMISSION OF SENTENCES FOR CONFIRMATION

374.* When the Court of Session passes sentence of death, the Sentence of death to be submitted by Court of Session

proceedings shall be submitted to the High Court and the sentence shall not be executed unless it is confirmed by the High Court

1 Scope and object — The Legislature has provided in the confirmation proceedings a final safeguard of the life and liberty of the subject in cases of capital sentences. The High Court has been given wide powers under this chapter in order to prevent any possible miscarriage of justice¹. Similar reference is also provided under special laws in the case of sentences of death passed thereunder².

References for confirmation can be made only in cases of sentences of death³.

The records transmitted to the High Court in a confirmation case must be complete⁴.

As to the time within which reference should be made see the undermentioned case⁵.

The section does not make it a condition precedent to the confirmation of a death sentence that the proceedings shall be submitted by the Court of Session. If it is brought to the notice of the High Court that the Sessions Judge had omitted to send the record for confirmation the High Court can in the exercise of its powers of revision call for the record and deal with it according to law⁶. See also S 439 and Notes thereon.

thinks that a further inquiry should be made into, or additional evidence taken upon, any point bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the convicted person, it may make such inquiry or take such evidence itself, or direct it to be made or taken by the Court of Session

1 Further enquiry — If on the reference under s 374, the High Court thinks that a further enquiry is to be made, or additional evidence is to be taken regarding the guilt or innocence of the accused, it may make such further enquiry, or take such additional evidence itself, or direct the Court of Session to do so. Further enquiry would ordinarily be ordered, when there is any defect in the procedure adopted in the Court of Session. Thus, where the question was, if the accused was insane at the time he committed the murder of his wife and where there was evidence that the accused spoke like an insane man on the day previous to the murder, and there was no evidence of any reasonable or probable cause for any jealousy on his part by reason of any evil conduct on the part of his wife, and the assessors found that the accused was not of sound mind, the High Court held that it was a "defect of enquiry" not to have placed the accused under medical observation. The High Court consequently directed the Court of Session to place the convicted person under medical observation for a month, and then forward the case to them, with the evidence of the medical officer and opinion of the Sessions Judge¹. Where again the prisoner was convicted on the sole evidence of his confession, which he alleged had been tutored by the Magistrate who recorded it, the High Court directed the examination of that Magistrate on the question of the alleged tutoring². The words "further inquiry should be made into or additional evidence taken upon" show that "further inquiry" does not always involve the taking of additional evidence. "Further inquiry" also includes the consideration of the evidence already taken³.

2 Additional evidence — Additional evidence will be directed to be taken or taken by the High Court itself when such evidence has been improperly rejected by the Court of Session as in the case of a confession wrongly rejected,¹ or when the evidence already on record is insufficient for arriving at a proper decision. Thus when the evidence as to the prisoner's state of mind was insufficient additional evidence was called for².

Where during the course of the trial, the accused applied to be allowed to call for certain evidence material to his defence, and the Court of Session improperly refused to grant his application the High Court permitted him under this section to produce such evidence³

Under this section additional evidence can be taken on any point bearing on the guilt or innocence of the accused while under S 428 additional evidence can be taken whenever the appellate Court thinks it necessary. Thus under S 428 an appellate Court may test the value of a statement made by a defence witness by taking additional evidence in appeal⁴ while under this section testimony of witnesses cannot be tested by admitting additional evidence. Thus the High Court cannot refer to the earlier statements made by the witnesses to the police with a view to discredit such witnesses⁵

Where the circumstances called for the re opening of the whole case owing to a grave irregularity in procedure it was held that the proper course was to set aside the conviction and order a re trial instead of directing additional evidence to be taken under this section⁶

3 Presence of the accused—The presence of the accused could be dispensed with when the High Court is recording additional evidence¹

4 Appeal—Where on a reference the High Court had pronounced its decision it was held that the accused had no further right of appeal though at the time of reference he could have preferred an appeal¹

1 Scope — In dealing with an appeal the High Court cannot interfere with the verdict of the jury unless such verdict is erroneous owing to a misdirection by the Judge or to a misunderstanding on the part of the jury of the law as laid down by the Judge. But in the case of a reference under S 374 the powers of the High Court are not so limited and it is open to the High Court to go into the facts and to come to the conclusion that the finding of the jury is an unsafe finding or is not justified by the evidence on record.¹ The High Court is thus empowered in such cases to substitute its own finding in the place of the verdict of the jury even though the verdict is unanimous.² There seems to be no

statutory limit to the power of the High Court in this behalf. The whole broad question of the guilt or innocence of the accused is before the High Court and not merely the question of law as to evidence as in an appeal under S 418 or questions of misdirection by the Judge or of misunderstanding on the part of the jury as under S 423 (2)³. As a matter of fact it has been held that in the case of a reference under S 374 the question of misdirection is not of much importance as the High Court is obliged to come to its own independent conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused independently of the verdict of the jury or even of the opinion of the Judge⁴. Indeed the Legislature has provided in a reference under S 374 a final safeguard analogous to the functions of the Home Office in England and has laid this duty on the High Court⁵. Of course the High Court has got this power only in cases where the sentence of death has been passed⁶.

But the High Court will act with great circumspection before it sets aside the verdict of the jury. It will generally interfere where the evidence which might have materially affected the finding has been improperly rejected or admitted or where the jury were improperly charged or where they misunderstood the trial Judge's directions or where the proved facts are wholly insufficient to support their verdict⁸.

The section empowers the High Court to confirm the sentence only after the disposal of appeal if any by the accused. Thus the power conferred on a High Court under this section is subject to the result of appeal under S 418. If the appeal itself succeeds on its own grounds its result should not be allowed to be affected by the exercise of any power conferred on the High Court by Ss 374 to 376. In such a case it has been held that it is not open to the High Court to convict the accused on its own appreciation of facts. An order of retrial by the jury is the only course left to the High Court if it does not acquit or discharge the accused⁹. But it has been held that in an appeal under S 449 in a case tried by a jury under chapter XXXIII the High Court on finding instances of misdirection or non-direction of jury in the lower Court or that inadmissible evidence has been admitted by such Court is not bound to order a retrial but may maintain the conviction if on its own appreciation of the evidence after excluding the inadmissible part of it it considers the guilt of the accused as established¹⁰.

2 May confirm the sentence — Before the High Court confirms the sentence of death it will see if the verdict of the jury is supported by the evidence on record¹ and is right on the facts before it². As a matter of fact the death sentence will not be statutory limit to the power of the High Court in this behalf. The whole broad question of the guilt or innocence of the accused is before the High Court and not merely the question of law as to evidence as in an appeal under s 418 or questions of misdirection by the Judge or of misunderstanding on the part of the jury as under s 423 (2)³. As a matter of fact it has been held that in the case of a reference under s 374 the question of misdirection is not of much importance as the High Court is obliged to come to its own independent conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused independently of the verdict of the jury or even of the opinion of the Judge⁴. Indeed the Legislature has provided in a reference under s 374 a final safeguard analogous to the functions of the Home Office in England and has laid this duty on the High Court⁵. Of course the High Court has got this power only in cases where the sentence of death has been passed⁶.

But the High Court will act with great circumspection before it sets aside the verdict of the jury. It will generally interfere where the evidence which might have materially affected the finding has been improperly rejected or admitted or where the jury were improperly charged or where they misunderstood the trial Judge's directions, or where the proved facts are wholly insufficient to support their verdict⁸.

The section empowers the High Court to confirm the sentence only after the disposal of appeal if any by the accused. Thus the power conferred on a High Court under this section is subject to the result of appeal under s 418. If the appeal itself succeeds on its own grounds its result should not be allowed to be affected by the exercise of any power conferred on the High Court by ss 374 to 376. In such a case it has been held that it is not open to the High Court to convict the accused on its own appreciation of facts. An order of retrial by the jury is the only course left to the High Court if it does not acquit or discharge the accused⁹. But it has been held that in an appeal under s 449 in a case tried by a jury under chapter XXXIII the High Court on finding instances of misdirection or non-direction of jury in the lower Court or that inadmissible evidence has been admitted by such Court is not bound to order a re-trial but may maintain the conviction if on its own appreciation of the evidence after excluding the inadmissible part of it, it considers the guilt of the accused as established¹⁰.

2 May confirm the sentence — Before the High Court confirms the sentence of death it will see if the verdict of the jury is supported by the evidence on record¹ and is right on the facts before it². As a matter of fact the death sentence will not be confirmed unless the High Court feels completely satisfied about the guilt of the accused even though the trial has been with the aid of a jury. In confirming the sentence the High Court should scrutinise the evidence and see whether the verdict of the jury is perverse whether the evidence has been improperly excluded or improperly admitted and whether the trial Judge has properly directed the jury on the points of decision and has pointed out to them how far those points in his opinion are established or not by admissible and relevant evidence and has otherwise directed the jury properly.³ Where inadmissible evidence has been admitted in a jury trial under Chap XXXIII the High Court may in appeal after excluding the inadmissible evidence maintain the conviction provided the admissible evidence remaining on record clearly establishes the guilt of the accused and is not bound to order a re trial.⁴

Where the evidence is totally circumstantial some Judges have been averse to confirming the sentence of death and have commuted it to one of transportation for life.⁵ There is however no rule of law that where the evidence is wholly circumstantial death sentence should not be awarded.⁶ In the undermentioned case⁷ where the evidence was entirely circumstantial and the accused was a young man of nineteen years the sentence of transportation for life awarded by the Sessions Judge was not enhanced to one of death.

There seems to be some difference of opinion on the question if the age or sex of the accused can of itself be a sufficient reason for reducing the sentence. It may however be safely said that the age of the accused is a fact which might well be taken into consideration and has been in fact taken into consideration in determining the sentence to be passed in cases of murder.⁸

One view is that the age or sex of the accused is not of itself a sufficient reason for awarding the lesser sentence.⁹ 'If there are other reasons which very nearly justify the passing of the lesser sentence but do not quite do so or when it is doubtful whether they do so or not, then the youth or sex of the criminal may certainly tip the scale to the side of mercy.'¹⁰ This view has been dissented from in the undermentioned cases.¹¹

however says in the case of an ordinary murder the delay in confirming a sentence of death may perhaps be taken into consideration.⁷ Where an accused was once sentenced to death but the High Court quashed the conviction on the ground of want of territorial jurisdiction and the accused was for a second time sentenced to death by a Court of competent jurisdiction the High Court of Lahore commuted the sentence of death to one of transportation for life on the ground that the second trial was for an offence committed four and a half years ago.⁸ See also the unmentioned decision of the Federal Court.⁹

Where murder is committed under grave provocation but not under grave and sudden provocation the accused will not be free from legal responsibility for murder, yet the High Court in such a case will commute the sentence of death to one of transportation for life.¹⁰ An accused killed his brother-in-law a lad of eight years under the belief that the deceased was helping in the infidelity of his wife. Yet the murder not having been committed under the immediate influence of provocation induced by that belief the High Court of Calcutta¹¹ confirmed the sentence of transportation for life but expressed the view that the Government might consider the question of reduction of sentence.

Where the accused at the time of the murder was suffering from mental derangement of some sort but was not by reason of such unsoundness of mind incapable of knowing the nature of his act or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law, it was held that he was entitled to every indulgent consideration though guilty of murder.¹² Thus where, because they cried and vexed him the accused killed his own on the evidence of the servant of the deceased it being doubtful whether the servant could recognize the assailants the High Court annulled the conviction and set the accused free.⁴

5 "Convict the accused of any offence"—Under s 208 of the Code of 1872, the High Court was empowered to annul the conviction and order a new trial. This was interpreted to mean that the High Court could only order a new trial after annulling the conviction but could not convict the accused for any other offence of which the Sessions Court might have convicted him.¹ But under the present section the High Court is empowered to annul the conviction and convict the accused of any other offence of which the Sessions Court might have convicted him and which the evidence on record would warrant. Thus when the evidence on record showed that the accused took no actual part in the murder but that he helped in the disposal of the dead body and other articles the High Court acquitted him of the charge of murder, but convicted him under s 201 of the Penal Code.² Where the intention to kill was not clearly proved, the conviction for murder was annulled and altered into one for an offence under s 326 of the Penal Code.³ See also the undermentioned cases.⁴

The opinion has been expressed⁵ that clause (b) really has in view the circumstances mentioned in s 237.

6 New trial.—After annulling the conviction the High Court may order a new trial and send the case to the Court of Session. Where the evidence is incomplete and further evidence is felt necessary for giving judgment a new trial may be ordered.¹ Where an accused was tried for murder without any pleader or advocate having been appointed to defend him and where the difficulties appearing in the evidence had not been cleared up in the course of cross examination either by the accused himself or by the Judge, and the High Court felt it difficult to confirm the sentence of death on the evidence before it a re-trial was ordered.² Where the Judge practically withdrew the case from the jury by so the Judges constituting the Bench are equally divided in their opinion, the case with their opinions shall be laid before another Judge. The Judge to whom the case is referred on a difference of opinion is required to deliver his opinion 'after such examination and hearing as he thinks fit, and the order or judgment in the case shall follow such opinion. The difference of opinion may be either as regards the guilt or innocence of the accused or as to the appropriate sentence to be passed. In either of these cases, the section requires the reference to be made to another Judge¹ who is entitled to pass any order he thinks proper including an order directing re trial of the accused².

2. Difference of opinion as to the guilt of the accused—Where a Bench was equally divided in its opinion as to the guilt of the accused, Mr Justice Mahmood of the Allahabad High Court felt that the order should be one of acquittal "without the necessity of either a remand or a dissentient opinion being recorded." While admitting that this section rendered it necessary for the case to be placed before another Judge in this circumstance he observed

'I cannot help feeling that, as a matter of judicial etiquette, when one Judge differs from his brother Judge on a pure question of the weight of evidence as to the propriety of a conviction, the opinion of the Judge who is in favour of acquittal should prevail—at least as a general rule.

I have always felt that the deliberate opinion of one Judge in favour of acquittal upon a grave question of the weight of evidence in a case heard by a Bench consisting of only two Judges should, ipso facto, constitute in most cases a sufficient reason for creating such a serious doubt that the benefit of that doubt should be given to the prisoner"¹

In the undermentioned case,² Edge, C J, disagreeing with the above view observed that the view of Mahmood, J involved the subordination of the opinion of the Judge who was for conviction to that of the Judge who was for acquittal, apart from its being opposed to the statute, as admitted by that learned Judge himself. He further observed

"I know of no rule of judicial etiquette which prescribes that a Judge, in a capital or any other case, should subordinate his judgment to that of his brother Judge."

The working of this section has often led to anomalous results. Where, on the evidence of a lad of 18 years, Subramaniya Iyer, Offg C J, was for confirming the conviction for murder, Boddam, J, was for acquitting the accused Bhashyam Aiyangar, J, to whom the case was referred on account of this difference of opinion, agreed with Subramaniya Iyer, Offg C J, as regards the conviction, but differed from him as regards the sentence. The Officiating Chief Justice was for commuting the sentence of death to one of transportation for life on the ground that the accused committed the murder in consequence of the deceased attempting to blackmail him, but Bhashyam Aiyangar, J, passed the sentence of death without even considering the extenuating circumstance referred to by Subramaniya Iyer, Offg C J³. This, it is submitted, is a very hard case. If Boddam, J, had agreed entirely with Subramaniya Iyer, Offg C J, both as regards the conviction and the sentence, thus taking a more unfavourable view to the accused, the lesser sentence of transportation would undoubtedly have been passed. The fact that one of the learned Judges took a view entirely favourable to the accused resulted in a reference to the third who passed the sentence of death. While the sentence passed by Bhashyam Aiyangar, J, was perfectly legal under the Code, it is most respectfully submitted that it gives rise to the anomaly that a more unfavourable view to the accused on the part of Boddam, J, would have saved his life. Indeed, the accused in this case lost the benefit of the Officiating Chief Justice's judgment as regards the sentence, and the benefit of Boddam, J's judgment as regards the conviction. The course adopted by Carnduff, J, in similar circumstances, of passing the sentence of transportation for life, even when the Judge who confirmed the conviction was for passing the sentence of death, is, it is submitted, a very salutary one⁴

3 Difference of opinion as to the sentence to be passed. — It has been held that when the difference of opinion is as to the appropriate sentence to be passed, one Judge favouring the death penalty, and the other recommending that transportation for life would meet the ends of justice, the difference of opinion itself would be a sufficient ground for holding that the death sentence should not be passed¹. It has, however, been said that it is not an inflexible rule and the third Judge to whom the case is referred is entitled to award the death sentence if he thinks it proper. The rule of "judicial etiquette and practice" strongly advocated by Mahmood, J, (see Note 2) can be more easily followed in this case than in a case where the difference is as to the guilt of the accused.

379.* In cases submitted by the Court of Session to the High Court for the confirmation of a sentence of death, the proper officer of the High Court shall, without delay, after the order of confirmation or other order has been made by the High Court, send a copy of the order, under the seal of the High Court and attested with his official signature, to the Court of Session

380. Where proceedings are submitted to a Magistrate of the first class or a Sub-divisional Magistrate as provided by section 562, such Magistrate may thereupon pass such sentence or make such order as he might have passed or made if the case had originally been heard by him, and, if he thinks further inquiry or additional evidence on any point to be necessary, he may make such inquiry or take such evidence himself or direct such inquiry or evidence to be made or taken

2. Power of the first class Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate to remand — The first class Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate is not empowered to remand the case to the second class or third class Magistrate who submitted the case to him under s 562. Thus, where a second class Magistrate finding the accused guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt under s 325, Penal Code, sent the case to the District Magistrate under the proviso to s 562, it was held that the order of the District Magistrate sending the case back to the second class Magistrate on the ground that s 562 did not apply to the case was illegal. This section enacts that the District Magistrate should pass such order as he would have passed if he had originally heard the case, and a District Magistrate could not have sent the case to a second class Magistrate if he had originally heard it himself¹.

3 Power of the first class Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate to acquit — There is a difference of opinion on the question if the first class or Sub-divisional Magistrate to whom a case is sent under the proviso to s 562 is empowered to acquit the accused.

It may be noted that in the analogous s 349, where the trying Magistrate who is not empowered to pass a sufficiently severe sentence is required to submit the proceedings and forward the accused to the superior Magistrate, the trying Magistrate is to "record the opinion" that the accused deserves a more severe sentence than he can pass. But in s 562 the accused is "convicted" before he is forwarded to the superior Magistrate. Under s 349, the Magistrate is empowered to pass "such judgment, sentence or order as he thinks fit and as is according to law." Under this section such Magistrate "may pass such sentence or make such order as he might have passed or made if the case had originally been heard by him." In the undermentioned case¹ their Lordships of the Madras High Court observed as follows:

"When a Magistrate of the second or third class submits proceedings under s 349, he does not convict but merely expresses the opinion that an accused person is guilty. But when a case is submitted under s 562 a conviction has first of all to be recorded and so when the proceedings reach the Magistrate for disposal under s 380, that Magistrate has to deal with a person who has been convicted and it is not a case of the referring Magistrate having merely recorded the opinion that he ought to be convicted. Such opinion as the referring Magistrate expresses being that on the conviction, action should be taken under section 562. It is our opinion that when an accused person comes before a Magistrate under s 380, he can be treated only as a convicted person and that it is not permissible for the Magistrate acting under that section to set aside the conviction and to acquit him."

This view has been followed in subsequent decisions² of the same High Court.

It has, however, been held in Upper Burma Judicial Commissioner's Court³ that the power given to the Magistrate to pass such sentence as he would have passed if he had heard the case originally himself, enables him to acquit the accused. The same view is expressed, though as obiter, in an earlier case of the Lower Burma Chief Court⁴ and the Nagpur Judicial Commissioners Court⁵ has adopted the view of the Burma Courts. Support is sought for this latter view in the power given to the Magistrate to take additional evidence or make further enquiry. On this point the Madras High Court in the undermentioned case⁶ observed as follows:

"It may be for the purpose of satisfying the Magistrate that it really is a case for applying S 562 and possibly such evidence (additional evidence) might be taken with a view to seeing whether the conviction was correct. Even so in our view, S 380 does not allow of a Magistrate who acts under it to set aside a conviction."

2a Accused on bail—Procedure — Where the accused is on bail and is not present when the Court upholds a sentence of imprisonment, the procedure is for the Court to issue a warrant for his arrest to a police officer under S 77¹ There is no procedure laid down by the Code that the Court should ask the sureties to ask the accused to surrender³

3 When a sentence of transportation or imprisonment commences — There are three cases under the Code in which a sentence of imprisonment or transportation may commence on a future date

- (1) Where a person is convicted of two offences at one trial and the Court sentences him to suffer imprisonment or transportation for each of the offences the sentences to run consecutively (S 35)
- (2) Where a sentence of imprisonment or transportation is passed on an escaped convict and the new sentence is not severer in its kind than the sentence the convict was undergoing when he escaped (S 396)
- (3) Where a sentence is passed on a person already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment or transportation (S 397)

In all other cases, a sentence of transportation or imprisonment will commence from the time it is passed¹ and the Court has no power to direct that such sentence should commence on a future date² Nor has the Court power to make a sentence precede a conviction³ The reason is that a sentence should follow and not precede a conviction⁴ Thus it is illegal to sentence an offender for the period already undergone by him in the police custody⁵

A sentence of transportation or imprisonment should be definite in respect of each offence⁶

1 Amendments in 1923 — This section has been substituted for the old s 386 by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923 The material changes introduced are as follows

- (1) The word "attachment" has been used in place of the word "distress"
- (2) A warrant for the levy of the fine may now be issued for execution according to civil process against the movable as well as the immovable property of the defaulter
- (3) Where the offender has undergone the whole of the imprisonment awarded in default of payment of fine, no warrant against his properties should issue unless for special reasons recorded in writing

2 Recovery of fine — Section 64 of the Penal Code provides that whenever an offender is sentenced to pay a fine, with or without imprisonment, it is competent to the Court to direct that, in default of payment of such fine, the offender shall suffer imprisonment for a certain period The undergoing of such imprisonment does not, however, operate as a discharge or satisfaction of the order for payment of the fine, which may, nevertheless, be levied in the manner prescribed by this section,¹ i e —

- (1) by attachment and sale under the provisions of this Code of the movable property of the offender, or
- (2) by execution by civil process against his movable or immovable property or both, or
- (3) by both the above methods

There are, however, two limitations subject to which the above procedure is to be adopted, viz., —

- (1) Where the offender has undergone the whole term of imprisonment in default, no warrant should be issued for levy of the fine except for special reasons to be recorded
- (2) No fine can be levied after the period of six years after the passing of sentence, or, where, under the sentence, the offender is liable to imprisonment for a longer period than six years, then after the expiration of the period.² The mere fact, however, that the Court has written off a fine as irrecoverable is no bar to its taking action under this section within the said period if it subsequently appears that the offender has acquired the means of paying it.³

Where an offender is sentenced to pay fine only and to imprisonment in default of payment thereof the imprisonment may be suspended to enable the offender to pay the fine in instalments or on a future date.⁴

The provisions of this section have been declared to apply —

- (1) to the levy of all fines imposed under the authority of any Act Regulation, Rule, or bye law, in the absence therein of any specific provision to the contrary.⁵
- (2) to the recovery of the amount of maintenance ordered to be paid under s 488.⁶
- (3) to the recovery of all moneys ordered under this Code to be paid but for which no method is otherwise expressly provided for.⁷ Thus the recovery of compensation amount ordered to be paid under s 250, or of costs ordered to be paid under s 148 or of the court fees or process fees ordered to be paid under s 516A, may all be recovered in the manner provided by this section,
- (4) to the recovery by the Local Board under s 221 of the Madras Local Boards Act, 14 (XIV) of 1920, of any fee, toll compensation or damages due to it.⁸

Where money found on an accused person at the time of his arrest is taken and placed in the custody of the Court, it has been held that the Court at the time of convicting and sentencing him can impose a fine and order that the fine should be recovered by confiscation of the money under Section 517.⁹

3. "Has been sentenced to pay a fine." — Before a warrant can be issued under this section it is necessary that the Court issuing the warrant should have sentenced the offender to pay a fine. So, a Court cannot, for instance, issue a warrant, merely on a report of a Railway Traffic Inspector to the effect that damage has been done to the railway carriage and that it should be recovered.¹

A sentence of fine should be specific as to each offender fined.² It is not proper to sentence two or more offenders to pay a fine jointly.³

See also ss 63 to 70 of the Penal Code

4. Offender undergoing whole term of imprisonment in default—Levy of fine. — Under the section, as it stood before the amendment of 1923, the Court could issue a warrant for the levy of fine even though the offender had undergone the whole term of the imprisonment in default of fine. Under the present section as now amended, a warrant should not issue for the levy of fine in such cases unless for special reasons to be recorded the Court considers it necessary to issue such a warrant. But where the offender has been committed to jail for failure to pay the fine but the full term of imprisonment for default has not been completed, the proviso does not apply and a warrant can be issued.¹ Moreover, the proviso only forbids the issue of a warrant after the imprisonment in default of fine has been served, it does not require that where a warrant has been issued it must be withdrawn if the imprisonment in default of fine has been served for the full period.² But in dealing with such warrants the Court should follow the policy underlying the proviso, so that, if there are special reasons for not withdrawing the warrant the Court should refuse to withdraw it.³ The special reasons for issuing the warrant or for not withdrawing it should be reasons accounting for the fact that the fine has not been recovered before the sentence in default has been served and any reasons which are directed to that point would be relevant.⁴ The facts that the offence is a serious one and that the complainant has been allotted part of the fine are irrelevant.⁵ But it has been said that where an offender having the means of paying the fine chooses to undergo imprisonment rather than pay the fine, it is a sufficient special reason which will enable the Court in its discretion to order that the fine may be levied, notwithstanding that the offender has served the full term of imprisonment ordered for default of payment of the fine.⁶

6. See Statement of Objections and Reasons 1021.

Where an offender sentenced to fine and to imprisonment in default paid a portion of the fine, but the fact not having been communicated to the jailor he had to serve the whole term it was held that the Court had no jurisdiction to refund the fine but that the party should apply to the Local Government for a refund⁷

5 "Court passing the sentence" — The power to levy a fine is restricted to the Court *passing the sentence*¹ It may be exercised either by the Judge or Magistrate who passed the sentence or by his successor in office² See the unmentioned case³ See also Section 389

6 "May take action" — Where an offender has been sentenced to fine and to imprisonment in default of payment of the fine it is not imperative that the Court should take action in all cases The words may take action show that it is in the discretion of the Court to do so or not But where an order for payment of money has been made under the Code, s 547 provides that the amount shall be recoverable as if it were fine and it has been held that the Court has no discretion in such cases to refuse to take action under this section for the recovery of the amount⁴

7 Execution against immovable property — Prior to the substitution of this section for the old one in 1923 there was no provision for attachment and sale of immovable property of the offender for the purpose of realising a fine and it was held that a sale of immovable property for recovering a fine conferred no title on the purchaser as the sale itself was without jurisdiction¹ Clause (b) now enables the Court to proceed against the immovable properties belonging to the offender This however can only be according to civil process and not as provided in this Code The Court also has power to issue a warrant for attachment and sale of movable property and simultaneously to order execution against immovable property according to civil process

8 Priority over other debts — A fine imposed or an order for payment of money passed by a criminal Court is a debt due to the Crown—and as a Crown debt it takes precedence over ordinary contract debts¹ The character of Crown-debt is not lost even though there is a direction that it should be paid over to the complainant²

9. Death of offender. — Section 70 of the Penal Code provides that the death of the offender shall not discharge from the liability for fine, any property which would, after his death, be legally liable for his debts, and therefore a warrant for the levy of the fine may be issued under this section, even after the death of the offender, against properties in the hands of his legal representatives¹

10. Attachment of movable property — Clause (a) — Prior to the substitution of this section for the old one in 1923, the section used the word "distress" and Form No 37 of schedule V contained the words "make distress by seizure". As the words "movable property" were used in the section as being the subject of 'distress' that is, actual seizure, it was held that only tangible or corporeal movable property capable of being seized could be proceeded against by way of distress and not such property as debts or choses in action¹ which could not be 'seized.' It was also held that a share or interest in joint movable property could not be seized and therefore could not be distrained under the section² though a share or interest in joint property could be attached under S. 83 by the issue of a prohibitory order or the appointment of a receiver.³ The substitution in the present section of the word "attachment" for the word "distress" shows that even a debt due to, or a share in joint movable property belonging to an offender could be attached⁴. Sub section (2) provides that the Provincial Government may make rules for regulating the manner in which the attachment is to be made. In the absence, however, of any such rules the question arises as to the mode in which an attachment of a debt or share in joint movable property is to be effected. It has been held that seizure and sale of the property in which the offender has an undivided fractional interest are not legal.⁵ According to the High Court of Madras⁶ the proper course in such cases is to follow the principle adopted in the Civil Procedure Code and to proceed under O 21 Rr 46 and 47

The High Court of Patna⁷ and the Judicial Commissioners Court of Sind⁸ have expressed the view that the latter method to adopt in such cases would be to proceed under clause (1) rather than clause (a) of the section

Under sub s. (1) clause (a) of this section any movable property belonging to the offender can be attached. The provisions of the Civil Procedure Code exempting certain property from attachment and sale do not apply to criminal Courts⁹

Salary not yet drawn by the offender is not movable property within the meaning of this section¹⁰

11 "Belonging to the offender" — The Court has power under sub s (1) (a) to attach only movable property belonging to the offender and therefore cannot order the attachment of the money deposited by a surety for the appearance of the offender, in execution of a sentence of fine passed against the offender¹ Similarly, where joint movable property passes by survivorship to the other members of the family on the death of the person, such property cannot be attached as it is no longer property of the person in the hands of the other members² It has been held that a sentence of fine against a coparcener cannot be executed by attachment and sale of joint movable property of the family as the property cannot be said to belong to the coparcener who has got only an unascertained interest therein³

It is the duty of an officer entrusted with the execution of a warrant of attachment to ascertain by all possible means whether the property belongs to the offender⁴

12 Claims to property attached under sub-section (1) (a) — Under the section before the amendment of 1923, there was no provision for the determination of claims which might be preferred to the property attached¹ but the Court had, however, to satisfy itself that the property attached *belonged to the offender*² In cases of doubt it was held that the proper procedure was to stay the sale to enable the claimant to establish his title to the property in a civil Court³

1 Legislative changes.

- (1) This section was substituted for the original s 388 by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Second Amendment) Act 37 [XXXVII] of 1923 Under the section as it stood previously, the Court could not suspend a sentence of fine unless a *warrant for the recovery thereof had been issued under s 386*¹ This is not necessary now.
- (2) Under the old section a suspension of the sentence could not exceed a period of fifteen days from the date of executing a bond under the section Under the present section there can now be an order for payment in two or three monthly instalments and suspension of the sentence during that period

2. Scope of the section — In order that the section may apply, two conditions are necessary, namely, that the offender must have been sentenced,

(1) to fine only, and

(2) to imprisonment in default of payment of such fine

The section has, therefore, no application to cases where an offender has been sentenced to fine in addition to a sentence of imprisonment¹ or where he is not sentenced to imprisonment in default of the payment of the fine²

3. Order for payment of money on non-recovery of which imprisonment may be awarded — Sub-section (2) — Under s 64 of the Penal Code, whenever a sentence of fine is passed the Court can order that in default of payment of such fine, the defaulter shall suffer imprisonment for a certain period There is no such general provision as to orders for payment of money other than fine Sub section (2) of this section refers to an order made by a criminal Court for the payment of money but which is not a punishment inflicted on an offender for a criminal offence¹ The Court has no power to order imprisonment in default of payment of any such amount unless it is specifically provided for by a statute.² The Code contains the following provisions for payment of money on the non recovery of which imprisonment may be awarded

- (i) Payment of compensation under S 250, sub s (2A)
- (ii) Payment of maintenance under S 489, sub s (3)
- (iii) Payment of the penalty due on a bond under S 514 sub s (4)
- (iv) Payment of process fees, etc., under S 516A, sub s (1)

In such cases if the money is not paid forthwith the Court may require the person to enter into a bond as provided by sub s (1) and on his failure to do so may at once pass a sentence of imprisonment

See S 250, S 514, sub s (4), S 489 and S 516A

It is not necessary that a warrant for the levy of such amount should be issued, and the undermentioned cases³ decided before the amendment to sub s (1) are no longer of any practical importance

389.* Every warrant for the execution of any sentence may be issued either by the Judge or Magistrate who passed the sentence, or by his successor in office

Who may issue warrant

1. Successor in office — A sentence was passed by a Special Magistrate appointed under Ordinance 11 [X] of 1931. The Special Criminal Court came to an end in 1932 with the expiry of the Ordinance. It was held that the Sub divisional Magistrate who succeeded the Special Magistrate was not a successor in office of the Special Magistrate and that he had no power to issue the warrant¹

Whipping Act (4 [IV] of 1909) See Note 2

1 Legislative changes.—The words “subject to the provisions of s 391” were added by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 12 [XII] of 1923 See Note 3

2 When the accused is sentenced to whipping only—This section applies when the accused is sentenced to whipping only. Sentences of whipping are passed under the provisions of the Whipping Act (4 [IV] of 1909). Sections 3 and 5 of that Act deal with offences for which whipping can be given in lieu of other punishments prescribed under the Penal Code, while s 4 deals with offences for which whipping can be given in addition to the other punishments prescribed therefor.

Section 3 of the Whipping Act, 4 [IV] of 1909, enacts that (a) in the cases of theft under s 378, Penal Code, and aggravated forms of it under ss 390 and 392, and (b) in the cases of lurking house trespass or house breaking under ss 443 and 445, Penal Code, and aggravated forms of them under ss 444 and 446 Penal Code, respectively, whipping may be awarded in lieu of the other punishments.

Section 5 of the said Whipping Act provides that the punishment of whipping may be inflicted upon juvenile offenders in lieu of other punishments in the following cases

- (i) All offences punishable under the Penal Code, except those specified in chapter VI and in ss 153A and 505 and offences punishable with death
- (ii) Offences punishable under any other law with imprisonment, which the Provincial Government may specify in this behalf

Thus, this section applies only in those cases where sentences of whipping are passed under ss 3 and 5 of the Whipping Act.

Where a youthful offender for one offence is ordered to be detained in a Training School or a Borstal Institution and for another offence tried at the same trial is sentenced to whipping, the Magistrate must act under the provisions of this section¹. The reason is that a person sentenced to detention in a Borstal Institution is not sentenced to imprisonment.

3 “At such place and time as the Court may direct”—According to the High Court of Bombay the sentence of whipping need not necessarily be executed on the same day as the sentence was passed, but the Court can fix a day in the future for that purpose¹.

Before the amendment of s 391 in 1923, it was held by the High Court of Madras that a Magistrate had no power to suspend or postpone the execution of a sentence of whipping only, even in cases where such sentence was appealable (as where a second class Magistrate passed a sentence of whipping only)². This practically rendered the right of appeal nugatory. The Chief Court of Lower Burma, on the other hand, held that whenever a sentence of whipping was passed by a Magistrate, against whose sentence an appeal lay, the Magistrate was bound to ask the prisoner whether he intended to appeal and if the prisoner said that he intended to do so, to suspend the execution of the sentence on the analogy of s 391³. The addition of clause (a) to sub s (1) of s 391 now makes it clear that if the accused furnishes bail for his appearance, the sentence may be suspended for fifteen days or, if an appeal is made within that time, until after the sentence is confirmed

4 Postponement of sentence of whipping when accused is under sentence of imprisonment in another trial — The direction in this section, that the sentence shall be executed at such place and time as the Court may direct, is intended for the case where the accused is not already under another sentence and is not also at the same time sentenced to imprisonment. It, therefore does not apply where he is already under another sentence of imprisonment. In such a case the Court should, when passing the order required by this section, follow the analogy of s 391 (1) as far as may be. It cannot, therefore, postpone a sentence of whipping only till after the accused has undergone a sentence of imprisonment in another case¹

391.* (i) When the accused —

Execution of sentence (a) is sentenced to whipping only and furnishes bail of whipping in addition to the satisfaction of the Court for his appearance at to imprisonment such time and place as the Court may direct, or

(b) is sentenced to whipping in addition to imprisonment, the whipping shall not be inflicted until fifteen days from the date of the sentence, or, if an appeal is made within that time, until the sentence is confirmed by the Appellate Court, but the whipping shall be inflicted as soon as practicable after the expiry of the fifteen days, or, in case of an appeal, as soon as practicable after the receipt of the order of the Appellate Court confirming the sentence.

(2) The whipping shall be inflicted in the presence of the officer in charge of the jail, unless the Judge or Magistrate orders it to be inflicted in his own presence.

(3) No accused person shall be sentenced to whipping in addition to imprisonment when the term of imprisonment to which he is sentenced is less than three months.

imprisonment in addition to which whipping was given, has expired² Indeed it is illegal to order a sentence of whipping to be inflicted on the prisoner at the time of his release from the jail³ There is no provision of law under which an accused who has been released after having undergone his sentence of imprisonment could be called back to undergo the sentence of whipping⁴ In such cases the sentence of whipping should be cancelled as having become inoperative⁵

Where, again an accused is sentenced on three separate convictions, first to a term of imprisonment second to a certain number of lashes to be inflicted at the expiry of the period of imprisonment, and third to a term of imprisonment after whipping the postponement of whipping to the expiry of the term of imprisonment under the first conviction is illegal and hence the second term of conviction will begin on the expiry of the first⁶

A sentence of whipping not inflicted within the statutory period or within the period prescribed therefor, becomes inoperative⁷

While Magistrates have no power to postpone the execution of sentence of whipping, they are also not entitled to inflict it before the expiry of the period specified in the section Thus, where a Magistrate of the first class convicted an accused of theft and sentenced him to one month's rigorous imprisonment and twenty lashes, the District Magistrate took the case in revision and holding that whipping could not be added to imprisonment, directed the accused to be whipped and submitted the case for the orders of the Chief Court The Chief Court held that the sentence being an appealable one to the Court of Session the District Magistrate acted illegally in taking up the case in revision and directing the accused to be whipped, before the expiry of the period allowed for appeal⁸

Where, however an accused is convicted of two offences for one of which he is sentenced to imprisonment and for the other to whipping, it is not open to the Magistrate to postpone the sentence of whipping on the ground that the accused has preferred an appeal against the sentence of imprisonment⁹ Before S 390 was amended, it was not illegal to execute the sentence immediately when it was given as a separate sentence for a separate offence and not in addition to imprisonment¹⁰ See also Section 35 Note 9

6 Double sentence of whipping — Under the Whipping Act of 1864 it was held that when a person, who has been previously convicted within the meaning of S 4 of that Act is convicted at one time of two or more offences, he may be punished with one but only one whipping in addition to any other punishment to which under S 46 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1861 (now S 35) he may be liable¹ The said S 4 has been repealed but it is submitted that under this section also it would not be legal to pass a double sentence of whipping Thus, where an accused was convicted under Ss 454 and 380 Penal Code, and was sentenced to two years rigorous imprisonment and fifteen stripes for each of the offences the High Court doubted if this double sentence of whipping was legal and altered the sentence to fifteen stripes for both the offences² See also Note 4 on S 39³

6a Officer in charge of the jail — A Borstal Institution is not a jail under this section and therefore the superintendent thereof is not an officer in charge of a jail and hence a sentence of whipping cannot be carried out in his presence¹

7 Whipping in addition to imprisonment for less than three months — Sub section (3) — When the term of imprisonment to which the accused is sentenced is less than three months it is illegal to award the sentence of whipping in addition to the imprisonment¹ person of or over sixteen years of age, "with such instrument, in such mode and on such part of the person as the Local Government directs" and in the case of a person under sixteen years of age, it was to be inflicted "in the way of school discipline with a light rattan" It also limited the number of lashes to one hundred and fifty, if whipping was inflicted with the cat of nine tails and to thirty if it was inflicted with a rattan

Section 392 of the Code of 1882 substituted the words "with a light rattan not less than half an inch in diameter," for the words "with such instrument" and further enacted that in no case shall the punishment of whipping exceed thirty stripes Section 392 of the present Code has amended the portion relating to persons under sixteen years of age from "in the way of school discipline with a light rattan" into "in such mode and on such part of the person and with such instrument as the Provincial Government directs" and S 7 of Act 4 (IV) of 1909 has added "and, in the case of a person under sixteen years of age, it shall not exceed fifteen stripes" to sub section (2)

2 Mode of inflicting punishment on persons of or over sixteen years of age. — The mode of inflicting the said punishment and the part of the body on which it is to be inflicted have been left to be determined by the Provincial Government The various Provincial Governments have provided as follows in this behalf

Bengal — The punishment of whipping should, in the case of an adult, be inflicted on the breech, with a rattan not exceeding half an inch in diameter, and on all occasions precautions should be taken to prevent the blows from falling on any other part of the person (Wilkins, 149)

Bombay — In the case of a person of sixteen years of age, whipping shall, when inflicted in private, that is, within the precincts of prison, be inflicted on the bare buttocks, and when inflicted in public, that is, without the precincts of prison, across the bare shoulders (Bom G R No 608 of 1897)

Madras — In the case of a person of or over sixteen years of age, the whipping is to be inflicted on the posterior and care is to be taken that the person undergoing the punishment is tied up to a triangle, or his immobility under punishment is otherwise secured—in order to preclude the possibility of the rattan falling on any other part of the body (Gaz Not No 4, 1st Jan 1883)

A thin cloth soaked in antiseptic should be spread over prisoner's buttocks

Punjab — (1) It is to be inflicted on the buttocks with a rattan not more than four feet in length, and one and a half inches in circumference, not in public or in front of court houses, but always within some walled enclosure and in the presence of a Magistrate or the Superintendent of the jail, and when practicable, of a Medical Officer (Punjab Bk Cir Vol 2 S LV, p 269) (2) The triangle should be boarded on the side next to the offender, so as to prevent the possibility of the rattan curling round and touching the front or any other part of his person (3) The punishment is never to be inflicted in public, or in front of catchery, but always within some walled enclosure, either the jail, lock up, treasury or any other convenient place, and in presence of a Magistrate, and, when practicable, of a Medical Officer Superintendents of jails have been invested by the Local Government with powers of a Magistrate of third class, with a view to sentences of whipping being executed in their presence (Smyth 115 Gov Beng, Feb 29, 1864)

United Provinces of Agra and Oudh — The whipping shall be inflicted on the buttocks with a light rattan half an inch in diameter (G O No 1290, dated 12th May 1898)

Central Provinces — In the case of a person of or over sixteen years of age, the rattan shall be applied to the bare posterior, the offender being tied to a triangle and a leather apron fastened round his waist (C. P. Gaz Not No 20, 4th January 1909)

See also the undermentioned case¹

Burma — The punishment of whipping shall be inflicted with a light rattan on the breech in the way of school discipline (Burma Gaz Not No 193 dated 1st July 1898 Part I page 307)

It has been held illegal to inflict stripes on the hand²

3 Mode of inflicting punishment on persons under sixteen years of age — Under the Codes of 1872 and 1882 as seen in Note 1 above the whipping was to be inflicted in the way of school discipline in the case of persons under sixteen years of age³ This phrase in the way of school discipline was held to connote the degree of severity with which the punishment was to be inflicted¹ Now that phrase has been omitted and the Provincial Government is empowered to prescribe the mode of punishment² The several Provincial Governments have provided as follows

Bombay — In the case of a person under sixteen years of age it shall be inflicted in private with a light rattan across the bare buttocks

Madras — In the case of juvenile offenders a lighter cane than that employed for persons of or above sixteen years of age shall be employed (G O No 59 Jud cal dated 10th January 1898)

Punjab — In the case of a person under sixteen years of age it shall be inflicted on the buttocks in the way of school discipline with a rattan not more than half an inch in diameter (Not No 677 dated 16th May 1899 Punjab Gazette 1899 Part I page 314)

Central Provinces — The whipping shall be inflicted on the bare buttocks or in the case of a boy under twelve on the hands at the discretion of the Magistrate The instrument used shall be a rattan lighter than that used for adults and while the whipping is being administered the prisoner shall be held but not tied to a triangle or in any other convenient way as the Magistrate or officer present may think fit

4 Maximum sentence of whipping — All the Codes have limited the maximum number of stripes to be inflicted with a rattan to thirty It is enacted that in no case shall this be exceeded The question arises if at the same time an accused is convicted of more than one offence can he be sentenced to more than one sentence of whipping? Referring to s 46 of the Criminal Procedure Code (in force at that time) Peacock C J said

The Code of Criminal Procedure did not intend to allow two punishments of whipping to be inflicted at the same time for two offences of which an offender might be convicted at the same time

His Lordship said in reference to the Whipping Act 6 [VI] of 1864

I do not believe that it was intended to sanction such a cruelty as to allow a double flogging to be inflicted upon a prisoner convicted of two offences at the same time¹

The words in no case in the Codes of 1872 1882 and 1898 clearly show that at one time not more than thirty stripes should be inflicted and it has been so held² under these Codes See also s 391 Note 6

Exemptions

393.* No sentence of whipping shall be executed by instalments and none of the following persons shall be punishable with whipping, namely :—

- (a) females;
- (b) males sentenced to death or to transportation, or to penal servitude, or to imprisonment for more than five years,
- (c) males whom the Court considers to be more than forty-five years of age.

1. Execution of whipping by instalments — The sentence of whipping is not to be executed by instalments¹ Therefore, no enhancement of the sentence of whipping can be made in revision after it has been executed, as it would amount to executing the sentence by instalments. Thus where, an accused person convicted under s 382 Penal Code, and sentenced to whipping was whipped and an application was subsequently made to the High Court for enhancement of the sentence, this section was held to bar the awarding of any additional sentence of whipping²

2 Persons exempted from being punished with whipping — Section 7 of the Whipping Act, 6 [VI] of 1861, provided as follows

"No female shall be punished with the whipping nor shall any person who may be sentenced to death, or to transportation or to penal servitude, or to imprisonment for more than five years be punished with whipping"

This section has in addition to these persons exempted such males as the Court considers to be more than 45 years of age¹ The Burma Whipping Act, 8 [VIII] of 1927, has extended the period of imprisonment from five to seven years for purposes of this exemption. Persons sentenced to transportation² or imprisonment³ for seven years cannot be sentenced to whipping Nor can women or persons under sentence of death be so sentenced⁴ It is to be noted that the wording of this section none of the following persons shall be punishable," as compared with the words in s 391 sub s (8), shall be sentenced' refers to the execution of the sentence of whipping and not to its being passed⁵ However, a sentence the execution of which is prohibited by law is illegal and cannot be passed⁶ The word sentenced in clause (b), it was argued, means already sentenced and does not refer to the sentence passed in combination with the sentence of whipping This contention was rightly rejected⁷ and it was held that the word must be understood in a general sense and if a person is sentenced for any period exceeding that fixed by the Act, whether in conviction in one case, or more than one, he cannot be punished with whipping⁸

But in computing the maximum period of imprisonment under this section, the period of imprisonment to which a man has already been sentenced before the commission of the offence for which the sentence of whipping is passed cannot be taken into account⁹

394.* (1) The punishment of whipping shall not be inflicted unless

Whipping not to be inflicted if offender not in fit state of health a medical officer, if present, certifies, or, if there is not a medical officer present, unless it appears to the Magistrate or officer present, that the offender is in a fit state of health to undergo such punishment.

(2) If, during the execution of a sentence of whipping, a medical officer certifies, or it appears to the Magistrate or officer present, that the offender is not in a fit state of health to undergo the remainder of the sentence, the whipping shall be finally stopped.

1 Scope — This section enacts that the sentence of whipping shall not be inflicted on an accused person unless a medical officer certifies, or in his absence, unless the Magistrate considers that the accused is in a fit state of health to undergo the punishment, and it should be finally stopped, if, during the course of its execution, it is found that the accused is not in a fit state of health to undergo the rest of the punishment "A man, though sentenced to whipping, is not to be whipped unless in a fit state to suffer that punishment. The whipping is not to be commenced if he is unfit to bear it all, and then he is to be kept in custody till the Court can revise the sentence. But, if it be commenced, it is not to be continued longer than the man is fit to bear it, and when the man has had all he can bear (in the opinion of the medical officer), the executioner is to stay his hand, and the sentence has been fully satisfied, for, it cannot be executed by instalments."¹ It may be noted that when a sentence of whipping has been executed in the presence of the Magistrate, Rule 287 of the Madras Criminal Rules of Practice, 1931, requires the Magistrate to record the fact of such execution

This section deals with the execution of a sentence of whipping which has been already passed. Where the question is whether such a sentence should be passed, it has been held that a Magistrate should not reject the punishment of whipping merely on the ground that the accused is too young and frail unless he has medical opinion in support of his own²

2 Certificate of the medical officer — The medical officer can under sub s (1) certify, before the sentence is inflicted, that the accused is, or is not, in a fit state of health to undergo the punishment and under sub s (2) he can certify, during the execution of the sentence that the accused cannot bear the rest of it. But it has been held that he is not empowered to certify before the whipping is commenced that the accused is fit to receive only a part of the sentence. Thus where before the whipping was inflicted, the medical officer certified that the accused could bear only six out of twenty lashes ordered to be inflicted on him it was held that (a) the medical officer not being authorized to grant such a certificate before the execution of the sentence it was not a valid certificate under sub s (1), and (b) the certificate not having been granted during execution was not a proper certificate under sub s (2). Hence the Magistrate's action in inflicting six out of the twenty lashes and awarding three months rigorous imprisonment in lieu of the fourteen lashes that were not inflicted was illegal and the imprisonment was set aside¹. In such a case as this the accused should have been kept in custody with a view to revising the sentence of whipping under Section 395.

into "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize any Court to inflict imprisonment for a term exceeding that to which the accused is liable by law," etc

The words "or to a fine not exceeding five hundred rupees," were added in sub-s (1) between the words "twelve months" and "which may be, etc" and the words "or a fine of an amount" were added in sub s (2) between the words "for a term" and "exceeding that . . . etc," by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923

2. Scope and object of the section.—In cases where a sentence of whipping cannot be carried out at all, under sub s (1) of S 394, because the accused is not in a fit state of health to undergo the punishment, or where it is carried out only in part the accused not being in a state of health to undergo the rest of it,¹ this section requires the Court to keep the accused in custody with a view to revise the sentence of whipping. The sentence of whipping can be revised (a) either by remitting it, or, (b) by sentencing the accused to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months in lieu of whipping, or, (c) by imposing a fine not exceeding five hundred rupees. It cannot be said that by reading S 392, sub s (2) which fixes the maximum sentence of whipping at thirty stripes, with this section which fixes the maximum sentence of imprisonment that can be given in lieu of whipping at twelve months, that sentences of thirty stripes and twelve months' rigorous imprisonment are of equal degree of severity.² But it may be taken that the Legislature regarded a sentence of twelve months' imprisonment as the maximum sentence of imprisonment which could be substituted for whipping. Thus, it has been held by a Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court³ that a substitute of thirty stripes for a sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment is not an "enhancement" within the meaning of S 423, sub s (1) (b). It has been seen in S 394 that a medical officer cannot certify before the sentence of whipping is executed that the prisoner is in a fit state of health to undergo only a portion of the sentence. If such an illegal certificate is given and in pursuance of it the sentence is partially executed, the Magistrate is not entitled under this section to sentence the prisoner to imprisonment in lieu of the unexecuted portion of the sentence of whipping.⁴

3. Court which passed the sentence — It is the Court that passed the sentence of whipping that can revise it.¹ This power to revise the sentence is not taken away by the sentence being confirmed in appeal.²

The words "Court which passed the sentence" do not mean the same officer who passed the original sentence of whipping. The word "Court" is impersonal, and its use instead of the words "Magistrate or officer" lends support to this view. Indeed, to confine the power of revision to the particular officer who passed the sentence would, in many cases, make the section unworkable. It certainly cannot be the intention of the Legislature that if at the time the sentence of whipping is to be revised under this section the particular officer who passed the sentence of whipping is not available he being either dead or transferred the accused should escape the commuted sentence under this section. It has consequently been held that when the Magistrate who passed the sentence of whipping is absent the District Magistrate can be held to be the Court which passed the sentence.³

4 Power of revision of sentence — As seen already the sentence may either be remitted or imprisonment or fine inflicted in lieu of it. The Court has however no power to take a bond under s 562 from the accused in lieu of it.¹ Before the amendment to this section in 1923 it was held that a sentence of fine cannot be passed in lieu of whipping.² Since the amendment those cases are not good law and now fine not exceeding Rs 500 can be levied.

The Court can remit the sentence altogether even though it is competent to inflict a term of imprisonment in lieu of whipping.³ The word imprisonment means a substantive sentence of imprisonment and not imprisonment in default of payment of fine.⁴ Sub section (2) enacts that where an accused is sentenced to whipping and imprisonment and where in lieu of such whipping imprisonment is inflicted the total term of imprisonment should not exceed that which the Court is competent to inflict.⁵ Therefore where imprisonment for the maximum period is inflicted in addition to whipping the entire sentence of whipping should be remitted for any further sentence of imprisonment will be beyond the competency of the Court.⁶

Where the sentence of whipping that has been passed is illegal as for example on a person above forty five years of age the Magistrate is not competent to revise such illegal sentence.⁷ The illegal sentence should be reported to the High Court for orders. But where at the time the sentence of whipping is passed it is ordered that if the sentence cannot be executed the accused shall undergo imprisonment it has been held that the conditional sentence of imprisonment is illegal and the Magistrate should act under this section.⁸

5 Solitary confinement — When imprisonment in lieu of whipping is awarded solitary confinement may be ordered though it is not specifically mentioned in the section.¹

take effect immediately, and, if of imprisonment, penal servitude or transportation, shall take effect according to the following rules, that is to say —

(2) If the new sentence is severer in its kind than the sentence which such convict was undergoing when he escaped the new sentence shall take effect immediately

Explanation — For the purposes of this section —

- (a) a sentence of transportation or penal servitude shall be deemed severer than a sentence of imprisonment,
- (b) a sentence of imprisonment with solitary confinement shall be deemed severer than a sentence of the same description of imprisonment without solitary confinement, and
- (c) a sentence of rigorous imprisonment shall be deemed severer than a sentence of simple imprisonment with or without solitary confinement

1 Legislative changes — Section 316 of Act 10 [X] of 1872 left it to the discretion of the Court to direct the sentence passed on an escaped convict to take effect immediately or after the expiration of the period of the imprisonment or transportation which the convict was undergoing at the time of his escape. But s. 396 of the Code of 1882 and the present section enact—(a) that the sentence of death, fine or whipping passed on an escaped convict shall be executed immediately and (b) the sentence of imprisonment, penal servitude or transportation shall be deferred or executed immediately according as the new sentence is lighter or severer in quality than the sentence which the convict was undergoing at the time of his escape.

2 Escaped convict — The word convict shows that the case of a person who escapes from custody while under trial is excluded from the operation of the section. There is a difference of opinion on the question if a person detained in custody for the purpose of giving security for good behaviour is not in custody for an offence though his detention may be lawful. Some cases have held that it is not a sentence of imprisonment though the detention is lawful and that his conviction under S. 224 Penal Code is illegal.¹ Other cases have held that the word sentence applies also to an order of imprisonment passed under S 123, in default of furnishing security² It is submitted that the former view is correct having regard to the use of the word convict The place of trial under S 221, Penal Code, for an escaped convict is the place from where he escaped. Trial and conviction by a Magistrate of another district will be quashed³

3. Sentence. — The punishment under S 224, Penal Code, for escaping from lawful custody is to be in addition to the original sentence and the Court in passing such sentence must comply with the provisions of this section¹

4. Execution of sentence. — As far as the sentence of imprisonment, transportation or penal servitude is concerned, the principle of this section is that the severer in kind of the two sentences shall take effect immediately and the lighter deferred Thus, when a life convict under sentence of transportation was convicted under S 224 of the Penal Code and sentenced to four months' rigorous imprisonment, it was held that it was illegal to give priority to the sentence of rigorous imprisonment as the transportation is a severer punishment than imprisonment¹ Similarly, where an accused under sentence of transportation for seven years escaped from where he was confined before transportation, and was convicted and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment, the latter punishment was directed to take effect after the period of transportation²

In the case of a sentence of death, fine or whipping, this section enacts that it shall be executed immediately When a person who escaped from custody while under sentence of death was convicted under S 221, Penal Code, the High Court directed the original sentence of death to be executed immediately.³

Criminal Circular Order No 9 dated the 15th July 1873 of the Calcutta High Court, required the Sessions Judges and the Magistrates in Bengal to carefully comply with the provisions of S 316 of the Code of 1872 and to specify in the warrant, the date from which the sentence is to take effect, whether at once or after the lapse of a period equivalent to the portion of the prisoner's original sentence which remained unexpired at the time of his escape, the date on which the original sentence, of which the currency was interrupted by the escape, being clearly shown This circular has now become obsolete as the present section makes statutory provision as to the execution of the two sentences

Where an accused was sentenced to three months rigorous imprisonment, and a certain fine or in default to twenty days rigorous imprisonment, the substantive term of imprisonment was overlooked through a mistake in the warrant of commitment to the jail, and he served only the twenty days imprisonment and was released The error was then discovered and five days after his release he was re-arrested and sent back to the jail to undergo the substantive term of imprisonment, it being directed that the imprisonment should begin on the day of re-arrest It was held that the order was a legal one⁴

Provided that, if he is undergoing a sentence of imprisonment, and the sentence on such subsequent conviction is one of transportation, the Court may, in its discretion, direct that the latter sentence shall commence immediately, or at the expiration of the imprisonment to which he has been previously sentenced Provided, further, that where a person who has been sentenced to imprisonment by an order under section 123 in default of furnishing security is, whilst undergoing such sentence, sentenced to imprisonment for an offence committed prior to the making of such order, the latter sentence shall commence immediately.

1 Legislative changes.

Changes introduced in 1872 —

There was no provision in the Code of 1861 as to how a sentence of transportation on an offender already undergoing a sentence of transportation, was to take effect. This was provided for in the Code of 1872 but in other respects there was no difference between the two Codes.

Changes introduced in 1882 —

- (1) The Code of 1872 referred only to sentences of imprisonment and transportation. The sentence of penal servitude was also added in 1882

(2) The proviso to S 31^a of the Code of 18 2 was enacted as a separate section in 1882 namely S 393

Changes introduced in 1898 —

There were no changes introduced in 1898

Changes introduced by Act 18 [XVIII] of 1923 —

(1) The words unless the Court directs that the subsequent sentence shall run concurrently with such previous sentence were newly added See Note 3

(2) The second proviso was newly added See Note 5

2 Several sentences—Execution of —The general principle is that sentences should take effect immediately on conviction and cannot be postponed¹ In cases however where several sentences are passed against the same person the Code has enacted a different rule namely that such sentences should run consecutively the one after the expiration of the other unless the Court directs that they should run concurrently² Section 35 enacts this rule where a person is convicted at one trial of several offences and several sentences are given This section enacts the rule where a person already undergoing a sentence is sentenced to imprisonment etc³

3 “Unless the Court directs concurrently with such previous sentence” — Before the amendment of the Code in 1903 S 35 enabled a Magistrate in a case where several sentences were passed at one trial to order that the punishments shall run concurrently¹ But there was no such provision (except in one particular specified) in this section and it was consequently held in cases not falling within S 35 that the Court had no power to order that the sentences should run concurrently² The addition of the

3b. Imprisonment in default of payment of fine if can be made concurrent. — Section 64 of the Penal Code lays down that a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine should be in excess of any other imprisonment to which the accused may have been sentenced. This implies that a sentence of imprisonment in default is not a sentence of imprisonment within the meaning of S 35 of the Code¹ or of this section² It has, therefore, been held in the undermentioned cases,³ decided under S 35 that sentences of imprisonment in default cannot be ordered to run concurrently. Following this view, the High Court of Lahore⁴ has held in a case coming under this section that it is illegal to make various sentences of imprisonment in default of payment of fine awarded in separate trials concurrent with each other Similarly, it has been held that a Court has no power to direct a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine to run concurrently with a substantive sentence of imprisonment passed for a different offence either at the same trial or at different trials⁵ In Emperor v Punjab Lalaji,⁶ the High Court of Bombay has, however, held that the word 'imprisonment' in this section includes imprisonment in default of payment of fine and that, therefore, where a person undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine is sentenced to a substantive term of imprisonment, the latter sentence will begin to run only on the expiry of the imprisonment for default

4. "Already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment," etc. — A is sentenced on the same day to two separate terms of imprisonment on two separate convictions Can A be said, at the moment the second sentence is passed, to be undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in respect of the first sentence? It was held by the High Court of Allahabad, in a case arising before the amendment of 1923, that he cannot, the reason being that a person cannot be said to undergo a sentence of imprisonment until he is *actually put in jail*¹ It was however, held in the same case following the undermentioned case² of the Bombay High Court that where several sentences were passed on the same day they might be considered to have been passed at one trial within the meaning of s 35 and that therefore, the Court could order the sentences to run concurrently The High Courts of Madras and Rangoon and the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Nagpur have on the other hand, held that a person sentenced to imprisonment must be deemed to be undergoing that imprisonment within the meaning of this section from the moment the sentence is passed and that, therefore, this section will apply³

A person who has furnished security under s 108 of the Code and is subsequently convicted under s 500 of the Penal Code, cannot be said to be undergoing any sentence of imprisonment at the time the sentence under s 500 is passed, though after such conviction the accused withdraws his security and is consequently committed to prison⁴

A person undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in a foreign territory will, for the purposes of this section be considered to be "undergoing the sentence" and consequently, a Magistrate is competent to direct that a sentence passed by him should commence after the expiration of the sentence which the accused is undergoing in the foreign territory⁵

3b Imprisonment in default of payment of fine if can be made concurrent — Section 64 of the Penal Code lays down that a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine should be in excess of any other imprisonment to which the accused may have been sentenced. This implies that a sentence of imprisonment in default is not a sentence of imprisonment within the meaning of S 35 of the Code¹ or of this section² It has therefore, been held in the undermentioned cases,³ decided under S 35 that sentences of imprisonment in default cannot be ordered to run concurrently. Following this view, the High Court of Lahore⁴ has held in a case coming under this section that it is illegal to make various sentences of imprisonment in default of payment of fine awarded in separate trials concurrent with each other. Similarly, it has been held that a Court has no power to direct a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine to run concurrently with a substantive sentence of imprisonment passed for a different offence either at the same trial or at different trials⁵ In *Emperor v Punjaji Lalaji*⁶ the High Court of Bombay has however, held that the word 'imprisonment' in this section includes imprisonment in default of payment of fine and that therefore, where a person undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine is sentenced to a substantive term of imprisonment the latter sentence will begin to run only on the expiry of the imprisonment for default.

months in respect of another offence it was held that this proviso did not apply as the latter sentence was not passed while the sentence of imprisonment under s 123 was being undergone, because the accused could not be called upon to give security until the expiry of the substantive sentence for theft and that the sentence of six months would commence after the expiry of the sentence for theft and should run concurrently with the sentence passed in default of giving security⁹

When the sentence for the offence is fine, s 64 of the Penal Code requires that any imprisonment in default of the payment of fine should be in excess of any other imprisonment to which the accused may be sentenced. Hence, in such cases, even though the offence in question may have been committed prior to the passing of the order under s 123, the effect of s 64 of the Penal Code would be to postpone the imprisonment in default of fine till the expiration of the imprisonment in default of security.¹⁰ (See also Note 5b)

It has been held that ss 20 to 26 of the Sind Frontier Regulations should be read with this section and that, therefore, this proviso applies to cases where imprisonment has been imposed under ss 21 and 24 of the Regulations.¹¹

6. Detention in civil prison, if "sentence of imprisonment." — The detention in civil prison is not a sentence of imprisonment within the meaning of this section. Where therefore a person undergoing detention in a civil jail is convicted of an offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, this section has no application and the sentence will commence, under the general principle of law, from the date of the order.¹

6a. Detention under Madras Borstal Schools Act, if can be made consecutive. — This section does not apply to sentences of detention under s 8 of the Madras Borstal Schools Act. Consequently, a direction in a case that the sentence of detention should commence after the expiration of the previous sentence of detention is illegal.¹

7. Effect of reversal of one of two sentences in appeal. — Where x is convicted and sentenced to imprisonment first in one case and subsequently in another, and the former conviction is reversed in appeal, it has been held by the High Court of Bombay that the second sentence will commence from the date of such reversal.¹ But this was not followed by the same High Court in the undermentioned case² in which it was held that such sentence will commence from the date of conviction. According to the High Court of Madras, the sentence already undergone in respect of the conviction which was set aside should be reckoned as imprisonment in the second conviction.³ The Judicial Commissioner's Court of Sind has held that the second sentence will commence only on the date of the acquittal in appeal in respect of the first conviction, but that the High Court has power under s 439 of the Code to reduce, on equitable considerations, the second sentence by the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused⁴

8 Transportation — First proviso. — Where an accused who is already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment is sentenced to transportation, the Court has got a discretion under the first proviso to direct the sentence of transportation to commence immediately or after the expiration of the sentence of imprisonment¹ If no order is made directing it to commence immediately, the sentence of transportation will commence only after the expiry of the sentence of imprisonment² Where, however, at the time the sentence of transportation is passed, the Magistrate is ignorant of the previous sentence of imprisonment, an order directing the sentence of transportation to commence immediately can be made later on³ By the amendment of sub s (1) this discretion has been given even in the case of a subsequent sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude The first proviso, therefore, appears to be redundant and unnecessary Where a person already sentenced to transportation for life is for the second time sentenced to transportation, this section has been held not to apply though, for purposes of calculation, a sentence of transportation for life is reckoned as 20 years⁴ It may be noted, in passing, that transportation cannot be ordered in default of payment of fine⁵

9 Sentence cannot be ante-dated — A sentence cannot be made to operate from a date prior to the date on which the sentence was passed Thus, where a prisoner was arrested on 27 1 1931 and was convicted and sentenced on 8 4 1931, it was held that the sentence could not be made to run from 27 1-1931.¹

10 Order as to commencement of sentence is not a judgment — An order made by a Court under this section as to the commencement of sentences is not a part of its judgment and may, therefore, be made after the judgment is signed¹

11 Power of High Court to pass concurrent sentences — The High Court has power, under this section, to pass concurrent sentences in the same manner as the Court which originally passes the sentences¹

12 Appeal. — Where an accused is sentenced to concurrent terms of imprisonment, none of which alone is appealable, he is not entitled to appeal against them collectively¹ Likewise when an Assistant Sessions Judge sentences an accused to imprisonment for a period not exceeding four years, under each of two sections of the Penal Code, directing the sentences to run concurrently, an appeal lies to the Sessions Court and not to the High Court²

398.* (1) Nothing in section 396 or section 397 shall be held to excuse any person from any part of the punishment to which he is liable upon his former or subsequent conviction

(2) When an award of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is annexed to a substantive sentence of imprisonment, or to a sentence of transportation or penal servitude for an offence punishable with imprisonment, and the person undergoing the sentence is after its execution to undergo a further substantive sentence, or further substantive sentences, of imprisonment, transportation or penal servitude, effect shall not be given to the award of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine until the person has undergone the further sentence or sentences

1 Scope of the section — This section provides that no person will be excused from undergoing any part of the punishment to which he is liable under former or subsequent convictions.¹

Where an accused was convicted under s 447, Penal Code and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three months and a fine in default of payment of which he was sentenced to imprisonment for twenty days and the substantive sentence was by some mistake overlooked with the result that the accused served only the sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine and was released, it was held that the accused could be re-arrested and sent to jail to serve the substantive sentence and the substantive sentence could be directed to begin from the date of his re-arrest.²

2 Sub section (2) — This sub section was first introduced in the Code of 1898. It supersedes the view held in the undermentioned case¹ that where a convict is imprisoned under two warrants which order consecutive punishments the first warrant should be completely executed both in respect of the substantive sentence of imprisonment and the imprisonment in default of fine before any effect is given to the second warrant. Where a person is already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine when a substantive sentence of imprisonment is passed against him an order directing that the subsequent sentence should take effect immediately and that the unexpired portion of the prior sentence should begin to run on the expiry of the subsequent sentence is not justified under this sub section. The reason is that this sub section only provides for the postponement of the imprisonment in default and not for its interruption.²

399.† (1) When any person under the age of fifteen years is sentenced by any Criminal Court to imprisonment for any offence, the Court may direct that such person, instead of being imprisoned in a criminal jail, shall be confined in any reformatory established by the * [Provincial Government] as a fit place for confinement, in which there are means of suitable discipline and of training in some branch of useful industry or which is kept by a person

"Instead of being imprisoned" — Since the detention is only instead of imprisonment in jail, the Court which sentences an accused person for any particular period of imprisonment cannot direct detention in a reformatory for a longer period¹ Thus, where a confinement in a reformatory for one year was ordered on a sentence of imprisonment for one day the sentence was held illegal² The period of detention should be defined and words like "or until he attains majority" should not be used³ See also S 8 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1897, and the undermentioned cases⁴

1 Scope and applicability of the section — This section does not disturb the constitution of an accused. It deals only with the power to suspend the execution of a sentence or remit the whole or any part of the punishment. The Provincial Government may act of its own accord (sub section (1))¹ or may be moved by an application (sub section (2)). The Provincial Government has power under this section to suspend the execution of a death sentence to enable the accused to appeal to the Privy Council.² Though an order passed under this section by the Provincial Government is in the name of the Governor because that is the constitutional form it has to take it is in reality an order of the Provincial Government.³

The special authority conferred by this section relates to persons sentenced to punishment and does not touch cases under S 337 in which a person charged along with others with a crime has under a conditionally tendered pardon given evidence against such persons.⁴ The effect of an order of remission is to wipe out the remitted portion of the sentence altogether and not merely to suspend its operation.⁵

of sentence or remit the whole or any part of the sentence with or without conditions. But where the Provincial Government has remitted a sentence unconditionally, it is not open to it to cancel the order and restore the sentence subsequently, except in cases of fraud or mistake. The general power of cancellation of orders under S 21 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, cannot be invoked in such a case.¹

2. Statement of opinion of the presiding Judge — Sub-section (2) — On the receipt of an application the Provincial Government may require, from the presiding Judge of the Court before or by which the conviction was had or confirmed, a statement of his opinion with reasons and a certified copy of the available record. The object of calling for such a statement is to avoid a possible misapprehension about the legality of the sentence passed or a mistake as to the propriety of a particular punishment inflicted.¹ The Judge may also suo motu send his opinion whenever he considers that the prerogative of mercy should be exercised in favour of an accused. The following are instances where the Courts have thus recommended the accused to the mercy of the Government —

- (1) discovery of facts after the final judgment is pronounced and signed, showing that the accused has committed no offence,^{1a}
- (2) an oversight on the part of a counsel or omission on the part of the Court to notice a relevant fact in the proceedings resulting in an error of fact or law,²
- (3) unsoundness of mind not strictly covered by S 84 of the Penal Code,³ see also Note 3 on S 376.
- (4) the punishment prescribed by the law being more rigorous than the circumstances of the case deserve.⁴

When any Court shall be of opinion that there are grounds for recommending to the Provincial Government to exercise the powers vested in it by S 401 and S 402 of suspending remitting or commuting the punishment to which any accused person has been sentenced the recommendation shall be submitted with the proceedings in the case through the Court of the Judicial Commissioner — C P Criminal Circulars Part II No 40

All recommendations for remission or suspension of a sentence made under section 401 by an officer of any subordinate Court to the Provincial Government in regard to a convict whose case has been before the High Court on appeal shall be made through the High Court — Calcutta G R and C O P 40

4 Violation of condition of remission of punishment — Sub section (3) — Section 227 of the Penal Code runs thus: Whoever having accepted any conditional remission of punishment knowingly violates any condition on which such remission was granted shall be punished with the punishment to which he was originally sentenced if he has already suffered no part of that punishment and if he has suffered any part of that punishment then with so much of that punishment as he has not already suffered. Under this section it is for the Court to decide whether a conditionally released prisoner has violated the conditions on which the remission was granted¹

5 "If at large" — Under S 21 of the Prisoners Act of 1900 the Provincial Government may grant to any person under sentence of penal servitude a license to be at large within such part of the province and during such portion of his term of penal servitude as may be specified in the licence and upon such conditions as the Provincial Government may by general or special order prescribe

6 His Majesty's prerogative of pardon — Sub section (5) — Primarily the power of pardon rests in the Sovereign and the provisions contained in this section in no way interfere with the prerogative of the Crown in that respect¹ The tendering of advice to His Majesty as to exercise of his prerogative of pardon is a matter for the Executive Government and is outside the province of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council²

1 Scope of the section — Certain accused persons were sentenced to death by a special Tribunal under Ordinance 8 (III) of 1930. The execution of the sentence was stayed by the Provincial Government pending the decision of the Privy Council in the appeal against the sentence. Before the appeal was disposed of, the special Tribunal ceased to exist and on the dismissal of the appeal it was contended that as the Tribunal ceased to exist and the time for execution had expired the custody of the prisoners was illegal. It was held that even if there was difficulty in carrying out the death sentence, still the Provincial Government could commute the sentence under this section¹. See also the undermentioned cases.²

^a402A. The powers conferred by sections 401 and 402 upon the Provincial Government may, in the case of sentences of death, also be exercised by the Governor General in his discretion

1. Scope of the section. — This section embodies the ancient maxim nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa (no person should be twice disturbed for the same cause),¹ and provides that where a person has once been tried and convicted or acquitted of an offence he cannot again be tried for the same offence or for any other offence which is not distinct from the one previously tried (See Note 2) It incorporates the common law principle of the well known pleas of autrefois acquit (formerly acquitted) and autrefois convict (formerly convicted),² namely, that no one shall be punished or put in peril twice for the same matter.³ The principle does not rest on any doctrine of estoppel, but on grounds of public policy.⁴ There is nothing like res judicata in a criminal trial so long as it does not terminate in either acquittal or conviction so as to attract the provisions of this section. Hence the mere fact that a question was determined in a particular way in a prior proceeding against the accused will not preclude its being raised again.⁵

The provisions contained in this section are complete by themselves on the subject of the effect of previous acquittals or convictions.⁶

Even in cases in which a trial is not barred under this section, it has been held in a series of decisions,⁷ following Rex v Plummer,⁸ that a judgment of acquittal fully establishes the innocence of the accused and that the fact of such innocence cannot be disputed in any subsequent proceedings. Thus, where A was acquitted of an offence and later on B was prosecuted under ss 213 and 214, Penal Code, (concealing offence and screening offender) with reference to the same offence, it was held that the fact, established by the acquittal of A, viz., that no offence was committed by him, could not be disputed in the prosecution of B.⁹ But in Malak Khan v Emperor,¹⁰ the Privy Council has held that where in a trial for murder and robbery, the accused is convicted of murder but acquitted of robbery and an appeal is preferred from the conviction for murder, the High Court is entitled to accept the evidence which has been disbelieved by the trial Court on the charge of robbery as corroborative evidence of murder.

2 In what cases fresh trial is barred — The question in what cases a fresh trial is barred under this section and in what cases it is not, can best be discussed by reference to the following illustrative cases —

- (2) A is tried for offence X and is convicted or acquitted. He is again sought to be tried for offence Y, for which a charge might have been framed against him in the former trial, under s 236 of the Code or of which he might have been convicted under s 237 of the Code.
- (3) A is tried for offence X and is convicted or acquitted. He is again sought to be tried for offence Y. X and Y are distinct offences forming parts of the same transaction but not falling within s 236 or s 237 of the Code.
- (4) A is tried for offence X and is convicted or acquitted. He is again sought to be tried for offence Y. X and Y are 'distinct' offences forming separate transactions.
- (5) A is tried for offence X. He is again sought to be tried for offence Y. X and Y are not distinct offences and do not fall within ss 236 and 237 of the Code, but form part of the same transaction.

fall either under sub s (1) or sub s (2). The subsequent trial is, however, obviously not barred. The reason is that if a subsequent trial for a distinct offence forming part of the same transaction is not barred, a subsequent trial for a distinct offence not forming part of the same transaction cannot be barred.

Case 5 is not within sub s (1) of the section. Sub section (2) also does not in terms apply to it, but it implies that a subsequent trial is barred, and decisions which have held that a subsequent trial in such cases is barred can only be supported in this view.² Thus, where A gives Z fifty strokes with a stick, each stroke is a different offence, but all the strokes form part of the same transaction. The offences are, however, not distinct and a conviction or acquittal in respect of one such stroke would operate as a bar to a subsequent trial for other strokes. For further illustrations see the cases noted below.³

From the above discussion, it will be clear that a subsequent trial of an accused person in regard to an affair will be barred in the following cases

- (1) Where the offence subsequently charged is the same as the one previously tried
- (2) Where the offence subsequently charged is one for which a charge might have been framed under S 236 or of which the accused might have been convicted under S 237 at the previous trial
- (3) Where the offence subsequently charged is one of which the accused might have been convicted under S 238 at the previous trial.⁴ But the High Court of Madras appears to have taken a contrary view.⁵
- (4) Where the offence subsequently charged is not distinct from the one previously tried (except in cases coming under sub ss (3) and (4))

A second trial will not be barred in any other case, although the offence subsequently charged may have been committed in the course of the same transaction as the one previously tried.⁶

Further, even with regard to offences which are not distinct, a second trial will not be barred in cases coming under sub ss (3) and (4) of this section.

As to the meaning of the words "same offence" and "distinct offences," see Notes 3 and 5 respectively.

3 "Same offence"—The word "offence" has been defined in S 4 (1) clause (c) as any act or omission made punishable by any law for the time being in force. That definition applies however, only where a different intention does not appear from the subject or context. Sub-section (4) of this section shows that the same act may constitute different offences. The words "same offence" in this section, therefore, must be taken to mean the same act or omission made punishable under the same provision of law. Where an act or omission is punishable under different provisions of law, the person committing it cannot be said to "commit the same offence" within the meaning of this sub-section.¹ Hence, the expressions 'same offence' and "same act or omission" cannot be treated as interchangeable. The judgment in the undermentioned case² is, it is submitted, not correct in this respect.

The view has sometimes been expressed³ that the words "same offence" in sub s (1) refer to the same transaction. It is submitted that such an interpretation is too broad. Subsections (2) to (4) show that though the transaction may be the same the offences involved may be different.

4 Any other offence for which a different charge might have been made under section 236 — The expression 'might have been made' means 'might have been lawfully made' ¹ As to when a charge may be framed under S 236, see Notes on S 236 See also the cases cited below ²

5 "Any distinct offence." — Before the amendment of 1923, S 35 of the Code provided that where at one trial, a person was convicted of two or more distinct offences the Court may sentence him to the several punishments prescribed therefor. An explanation to the section provided that separable offences within the meaning of S 71 of the Penal Code were not distinct offences within the meaning of that section. Separate offences not falling within S 71 of the Penal Code were, therefore, distinct offences. The word "distinct" which had been used in this section also even before 1923 continues to exist even now in this section, though by the amendment of 1923, it has been deleted in S 35. But the test to determine whether the offences charged at two trials are distinct for purposes of this section would be the same, namely, whether, if the offences were charged at the same trial separate sentences could be passed in respect thereof under S 71 of the Penal Code ¹ Hence, the following considerations based on S 71 of the Penal Code may be applied in determining whether two offences are distinct

- (1) Where the offences are constituted by the same acts or omissions they are not distinct ² See also Note 6

Illustrations

- (a) A person who has been tried for an offence under S 202 of the Penal Code cannot be tried again on the same facts for an offence under S 176 of the Penal Code because the offences under the two sections would be constituted by the same acts.³
- (b) A person who is acquitted of the offence of disorderly behaviour on a public thoroughfare under a Police Act [for example, the Rangoon Police Act, s 41 sub s. (16)] cannot again be tried under the Penal Code for rioting where the same acts constitute both the offences⁴

The undermentioned decisions⁸ in so far as they are inconsistent with the above view are it is submitted, not correct

It has sometimes been said¹⁵ that the test for determining whether an offence is distinct from one previously tried is to see whether the evidence necessary to prove the two offences is the same or different. It is submitted that such a test is not conclusive¹⁶ as it is possible that though the evidence necessary to prove two offences is different the offences may not be distinct.

Further the observation in the undermentioned case¹⁷ that in order to constitute distinct offences the offences must be totally unconnected, is not correct as the same transaction may involve distinct offences in which case they cannot be said to be totally unconnected.

6 Consequences of act happening after previous conviction — Sub section (3) — A is tried for causing grievous hurt and convicted. The person injured afterwards dies. A may be tried again for culpable homicide (Illustration c)¹

In such a case a fresh trial will be competent even while the accused is undergoing the previous sentence.

But a fresh trial will not be competent if the death had occurred, and was known to the Court to have occurred at the time of the previous conviction.² The reason is that sub s (3) will not apply to such a case while at the same time the offences charged at the two trials would be constituted by the same acts and as such would not be distinct offences. See Notes 2 and 5.

7. "Tried" — This section does not apply unless the accused has been *tried*¹ and convicted or acquitted. But the previous trial need not be one on the merits² so that an acquittal under s 247, in a summons case on the ground of the complainant's absence will be a valid bar under this section,³ although the summons had not been served on the accused⁴. The same principle applies in case of a withdrawal under s 494 of the Code⁵.

Security proceedings⁶ or proceedings under s 145⁷ do not constitute a trial within the meaning of this section. Similarly a proceeding for maintenance under s 498 of the Code is not a trial and a prior application for maintenance does not bar a fresh application. But where a Magistrate knows or has reason to believe that a prior application has been made and disposed of, he ought not to act on a later application without taking into consideration the adjudication on the prior application. See s 488 Note 28a.

Rangoon High Court has held that such proceedings are quasi criminal and that the principle of this section will apply to them.⁹

Where in a sessions trial in a High Court the jury is discharged on a difference of opinion between the Judge and the jury and the case is re tried with a new jury, there is no fresh trial, for the purpose of this section¹⁰ The High Court of Madras has, however, taken a contrary view in the undermentioned case¹¹ It has been held by the High Court of Calcutta that the re trial of an accused on remand owing to misdirection to the jury is part of the same trial which is not concluded till the appeal is heard and determined¹² Similarly, an appeal is not a fresh trial but only a continuation of the trial in the lower Court¹³

This section does not say that a person who has been tried and convicted or acquitted shall be acquitted if an attempt is made to prosecute him again for the same offence It says that he shall not be tried at all¹⁴ Therefore the acquittal of a person on the ground of his trial being barred under this section is illegal, the reason being that an acquittal implies a trial¹⁵ prosecution by the Public Prosecutor² is an acquittal within the meaning of this section. Similarly, the acquittal of an accused on the case being lawfully compounded is an acquittal for the purposes of this section³.

Where the sanction or complaint of a particular person or authority is necessary under the law for the trial of a person, the question arises whether in the absence of such sanction or complaint a Court which tries him is a Court of competent jurisdiction. On this question there is a conflict of decisions. The majority of the High Courts have held that the Court cannot be deemed to be a Court of competent jurisdiction in such cases.³ The Madras High Court in *Ganapathy Bhatta v. Emperor*⁴ had taken a contrary view, holding that the words 'competent jurisdiction' refer only to the character and status of a Court and not to conditions precedent for the prosecution or trial of a person. The question again arose for consideration before a Full Bench of the same High Court. After referring to the conflict of decisions on the point King J., with whom the other Judges agreed thought it unnecessary to come to any final conclusion on the meaning of the word 'competent' and held that the trial without a proper complaint was void under S 50 and therefore the judgment of acquittal was also void and so there was nothing which the accused could compel the Court to recognize in support of a plea of autrefois acquit.⁵ The Calcutta

Special Court were sought to be retried in accordance with the provisions of S 4 of Ordinance 19 (XIX) of 1943. Since their committal the Privy Council reversed the decision of the Federal Court mentioned above, holding that Ordinance 2 (II) of 1912 was *intra vires*¹⁹. It was held that the accused could not be called upon to stand a second trial on the same charges.

12 Identity of accused necessary for application of section — This section will preclude a fresh trial only if the accused in the second case is the same as the accused in the previous case. The conviction or acquittal of an accused person is, therefore, no bar to the trial of another person implicated in the same offence¹. But in determining the question whether there is sufficient ground for proceeding against a person the fact that another person accused of the same offence and on the same facts has been acquitted may be taken into consideration².

13 Dismissal of complaint or discharge of accused — The explanation to the section expressly provides that the dismissal of a complaint or the discharge of an accused is not an acquittal for the purposes of the section. The question has arisen whether notwithstanding this the provision of a special remedy in such cases under S 436 and S 437 impliedly bars the institution of a fresh prosecution for the same offence where the order dismissing the complaint or discharging the accused has not been set aside by a competent authority. It is well settled now that a fresh prosecution is not barred in such cases¹. The

Where a complaint is dismissed or an accused is discharged by one Magistrate, there is a conflict of decisions as to whether another Magistrate of co ordinate or inferior jurisdiction can start a fresh prosecution against the accused for the same offence. It has been held by the High Courts of Bombay,³ Madras⁴ Rangoon⁵ and the Chief Court of the Punjab⁶ that a fresh prosecution can be started by such Magistrate. A contrary view is held by the High Courts of Allahabad⁷ and Calcutta⁸ and by the Judicial Commissioners Court of Sind⁹ on the ground that it would be contrary to sound principle to allow one Magistrate to practically displace the orders of another Magistrate of equal rank and powers. It is submitted that there is no warrant for limiting the effect of the words of the explanation in this way. 14. "Discharge" — Meaning of — It has been seen in Note 13 that a discharge of an accused is not an acquittal for the purposes of this section.

Where on a complaint of a major offence the Magistrate frames a charge only for a minor offence, his action has been held to amount to a discharge of the accused in regard to the major offence¹ Where an offence triable as a warrant case is tried as a summons-case and the accused has been acquitted, it has been held that the order only amounts to a discharge² See also the undermentioned cases³

15. General Clauses Act, section 26.—Sub section (5) of this section provides inter alia that nothing in this section shall affect the provisions of S 26 of the General Clauses Act. That section runs as follows

“Where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more enactments, then the offender shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those enactments, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence”

Thus, the section clearly provides that if the same act constitutes an offence under two enactments the accused cannot be awarded two separate punishments for such act¹. But the section only applies where the offences under the two enactments are constituted by the same act or omission² and not where the offences are distinct³.

What is the effect of sub s (5)? Suppose, the previous trial has only ended in an acquittal. Can the accused be prosecuted again for the same act under a different enactment? On this question there is a conflict of opinion. The Madras High Court has held that in such a case the second prosecution is clearly authorised by s 26, General Clauses Act—as there is no question of punishing the accused twice for the same offence—and that this provision is expressly saved by sub section (5)⁴. But the Oudh Judicial Commissioner's Court has expressed a contrary view⁵. The Oudh view proceeds on the ground that s 26, General Clauses Act, only concerns the question of trying an accused at the same trial for offences under different enactments but not the question of the competence of a subsequent trial and that such a subsequent trial will be clearly barred under this section whether the previous trial has ended in a conviction or acquittal. It is submitted that the Oudh view unduly restricts the words of s 26 General Clauses Act, and is not correct⁶.

According to the Peshawar Judicial Commissioner's Court, even where the previous trial has ended in a conviction and sentence a subsequent conviction and sentence under a different enactment must be deemed as permitted under s 26, General Clauses Act read with sub s (5) and that s 26, General Clauses Act, will only preclude the enforcement of the subsequent sentence after the prior sentence has been carried out⁷.

proviso to that section provides that the trial of a person under the section in British India for an offence committed out of British India will preclude extradition proceedings being taken against him for the same offence. This section precludes only a fresh trial of a person on the same facts in the circumstances stated in the section. The object of this sub section is to provide that the fact that only a fresh trial is barred under this section does not affect the bar of extradition of proceedings created by Section 188.

16. Practice.—A plea of bar under this section can be raised at any stage of the case.¹ The plea can be raised even in revision,² though the proper time to take it is when the accused is called upon to plead.³ The burden of proving the facts necessary to establish the plea is on the accused.⁴ When a plea of bar is raised under this section, it must be determined after hearing the evidence and ascertaining what the facts are in the two cases.⁵ It cannot be constructively decided.⁶

1923,⁴ or under S 123, sub s (2),⁵ cannot be construed as giving a right of appeal in such cases

Where a right of appeal is given by statute subject to certain conditions and limitations, the right cannot be enlarged so as to nullify such conditions or limitations⁶. A right of appeal duly conferred on a person cannot be taken away by transfer⁷.

A right of appeal has been given not only by Ss. 405 to 418 of this chapter but also by other sections of the Code. See ss 250, 486, 515 and 524. The procedure to be adopted in all such appeals under the Code is that prescribed by this chapter (Ss 419 to 431)⁸ unless any of the provisions thereof specifically restrict the application of such provisions to appeals under this chapter. Thus, S 429 applies only to appeals under this chapter, it consequently does not apply to appeals under Section 476B⁹.

The section refers to criminal Courts. It does not, however, follow from this that the Code deals only with the appeals from criminal Courts. Sections 476B and 486 deal with orders passed by any civil or revenue Courts. Appeals in respect of orders from such Courts are specially provided for in those sections. As to the procedure applicable to such appeals, see Ss 195 and 476 and the undermentioned cases¹⁰.

under S 439 but it may be revised under S 115 C P C, but if the order is made by criminal Court, S 439, Cr P. C applies)

The words judgment, order, conviction and sentence are not used in a consistent sense in this chapter, with the result that a clear and consistent scheme as to appeals cannot be evolved from the chapter¹¹

The term "order" in this section means a final order. An interlocutory order is thus not open to appeal¹². See also Note 7 on Section 417.

An appeal is only a continuation of the trial¹³ and consequently the appellate Court, unless otherwise provided, has powers to do only what the lower Court could do and should have done and not to pass any order under any circumstances¹⁴.

The general tendency of the Amending Act of 1923 is to enlarge rather than curtail the right of appeal¹⁵.

1a Forum of appeal — Under ss 407, 408, 410 and 411 the forum of an appeal is dependent on the status of the Judge by whom the trial is held. Suppose there is a change in the status of the Judge after the hearing of a case and before judgment is given. Is the forum of appeal to be determined by the Judge's status at the time of the hearing or at the time of the judgment? On this question there is a conflict of decisions. According to the Allahabad High Court¹ the judgment does not form part of a trial under the Code and hence the Judge's status at the time of the hearing and not at the time of the judgment determines the forum of appeal. The Calcutta High Court also holds the same view². But the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court has held that the status of the Judge at the time of the judgment determines the forum of appeal³. The decision proceeds on the ground that as under this section an appeal lies from a judgment or order and not from a trial, it is the Judge's status at the time of the judgment that determines the forum of the appeal. But with regard to this point the Allahabad High Court thinks that this section only indicates that an appeal is to lie from a judgment or order and has nothing to do with the forum of an appeal⁴.

2. Appeal to Privy Council — Originally the Criminal Procedure Code did not provide for any appeal to the Privy Council.¹ In fact the Privy Council was held not to be a Court of criminal appeal for India.² But under the relevant clauses of the Letters Patent granted to the various Chartered High Courts such Courts could grant leave to appeal to the Privy Council in certain cases.³ Under those clauses of the Letters Patent the High Courts had to declare that a case was a fit one for appeal to the Privy Council. They had therefore to satisfy themselves whether the case fell within the limits prescribed by the

2a Appeal to Federal Court — The word 'judgment' in s 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, is comprehensive enough to include a judgment in a criminal case¹ Hence, the Federal Court has jurisdiction in criminal as well as in civil cases² An appeal will, therefore, lie to the Federal Court from the decision of a High Court in a criminal case

3 Limitation — See Note 9 on Section 419

4 "By any other law." — As is seen in Note 1 above, a right of appeal must be conferred expressly by a statute. If the right is created by a rule of the Government such a rule must not be ultra vires of the statute conferring the rule making power¹ An order may be that of a criminal Court yet there will be no appeal unless one is provided for by the statute² There is no right of appeal when a special or local Act lays down that sentences passed thereunder in criminal cases are *final*³

1. Legislative changes — The Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923, by which this section was substituted for the old s 406 has introduced the following changes in the law

- (1) Under the old section there was no right of appeal in cases of orders under s 118 read with s 107, i e, orders for security for keeping the peace¹ The present section has conferred this right

* Code of 1898, original S 406

- (2) Even in respect of orders in good behaviour cases, there was no right of appeal from the orders of the District Magistrate or the Presidency Magistrate² Under the present section appeals are provided from such orders to the Court of Session and the High Court
- (3) Whereas under the old section appeals lay only to the District Magistrate the present section provides appeals to Courts of Session and the High Court except where there is a Government Notification under the first proviso to the section See Note 2 below
- (4) The law has been made clear as to appeals in cases where proceedings are laid before a Sessions Judge under s 123 of the Code See Note 4 below

2 Scope of the section — The present section, while extending the right of appeal to orders for security for keeping the peace, confines the right only to such orders as fall under s 118. In other words, an order under s 106 as it is not covered by the terms of s 118 read with s 112 still remains non appealable¹ See s 106 Note 23

The jurisdiction to hear appeals in security cases which was vested only in the District Magistrate is now vested in the Sessions Judge and the High Court ordinarily. But power has been given to the Provincial Government by the first proviso to the section to direct that in any particular district notified in the Official Gazette appeals from subordinate Magistrates shall lie to the District Magistrate³. Before the amendment of the section appeals from the orders of an Additional District Magistrate also lay to the District Magistrate as the former was held not to be a District Magistrate under s 406³. The same would appear to be the law under the present section in cases covered by the first proviso thereof⁴.

When a special or local Act empowers a Magistrate to proceed under the security sections of chapter VIII of the Code in respect of persons specified in the Act an order by the Magistrate for furnishing security is one under s 118 of the Code, and s 406 applies to such an order⁵.

The Code does not confer a right of appeal from an order of imprisonment in default of furnishing security passed under S 123⁶

3 Hearing of security appeals—An appeal from an order requiring a person to furnish security to be of good behaviour or to keep the peace is distinguishable from an appeal against a conviction in respect of an offence specifically charged, where the only matter for consideration may be the credibility or otherwise of certain direct and positive evidence¹ In appeals of the former class it is not unreasonable to insist that the appeal should not be disposed of in a summary manner but by a judgment showing on the face of it that the Judge has applied his mind to a consideration of the evidence on the record and of the pleas raised by the appellant²

As to whether an appellate Court hearing appeals under S 406 has the power to order re trial, see S 423 Note 31 An appellate Court can modify or alter the bond in appeal under cl (c) to S 423³ It has however been held by the Oudh Chief Court that the appellate Court cannot enhance the amount of security demanded by the trial Court⁴ But it has been held by the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Sind that an appellate Court has power to extend the period during which security is required to be furnished and thereby extend the period of imprisonment to be suffered in default although power should be exercised only in exceptional circumstances⁵

4 Second proviso—Under sub s (2) to S 193 of the Code where a person has been ordered to give security for a period exceeding one year and does not give such security, the Magistrate (other than a Presidency Magistrate) is bound to lay the proceedings before the Sessions Judge for orders Notwithstanding such reference to the Sessions Judge an appeal from the order of the Magistrate as such lay as a matter of right to the District Magistrate under the terms of S 406 as it stood before the amendment of 1923 Two different Courts were thus likely to be in seisin of the same matter at the same time and this state of the law gave rise to conflict of procedure Under the circumstances the High Courts tried to lay down complex rules of procedure to mitigate the anomalies. It was held that the Sessions Judge should proceed to decide the case under reference before him only on satisfying himself that no appeal had been preferred and in case an appeal had been filed should stay his hand till the disposal of the appeal and that the right of appeal under S 406 was lost as soon as the Sessions Judge passed orders under S 123¹. It was sometimes held that an appeal under S 406 was meant only for cases in which there was no necessity to lay the proceedings before the Sessions Judge². The present section by enacting the second proviso has removed the right of appeal in such cases and simplified the law³. The right of appeal is however revived if pending disposal of the reference security is offered and accepted inasmuch as the acceptance of the security has the effect of automatically terminating the reference⁴. But it may be noted that the said proviso affects only cases of reference by the Magistrate to the Sessions Judge and has no application to cases laid before the High Court by a Presidency Magistrate under S 193.

An order passed by a Sessions Judge on reference under S 123 is not an order of the Magistrate and therefore continues to be non appealable under S 406⁵.

See also the undermentioned case⁶.

1 "Convicted on a trial" — Section 4 of the Code of 1872 defined trial as the proceedings taken in Court after a charge has been drawn up and as including the punishment of an offence. Subsequent Codes have not defined the term trial as such but in S 4 of the present Code the term is distinguished as being different from an inquiry under the Code. A trial under the Code would imply the proceedings in which a person stands before a Court empowered to convict him of some offences alleged against him¹. The essentials of a trial are thus the charge of an offence and the power in the Court to convict the offender for the offence. The term conviction denotes the finding of guilty as distinguished from an acquittal or discharge on a finding of not guilty. On a conviction a sentence will follow in the usual course except as otherwise provided by the Code as for example in S 562. The expression "convicted on a trial" has thus sole reference to cases in which an accused has been held guilty of an offence². See the language of Ss 213, 258, 262 (2), 306 (2), 307 (2) and (3) and 367.

It follows that a decision in which an offence is not involved is not a conviction on a trial. Before the change introduced in 1898 in S 4 (1) (o), an illegal seizure of cattle did not amount to an 'offence and an order under the Cattle trespass Act, 1871 for compensation for illegal seizure was held not to amount to a conviction on trial and not appealable.³ Such an order now amounts to a "conviction on a trial and is appealable." An order under S 488 of this Code directing payment of a monthly allowance in default of maintenance is not a conviction on a trial.⁵ So also, an order under the Workmen's Breach of Contract Act for refund of the amount of advance⁶ or an order imposing a penalty and inflicting a sentence of imprisonment⁷ or to perform a contract under the said Act⁸ or forfeiting the security furnished under chapter VIII,⁹ is not an order of 'conviction on a trial'.

A person sentenced to a fine on summary action under S 480 is not 'convicted on a trial' and an appeal against such a sentence lies only under S 486 and not under this section.¹⁰

The appeal being from a conviction, the absence of a sentence, as in cases falling under S 562, is no bar to an appeal¹¹ nor will an appeal lie against the sentence alone except in cases provided for in S 412 of the Code.¹²

2 Trial held by a second class Magistrate. — According to the wording of S 407 it is not the conviction by a second class Magistrate but the holding of a trial by such Magistrate that determines the forum of the appeal.¹ Where a second class Magistrate in the course of the proceedings in the same case is invested with first class powers the question arises whether the appeal lies to the District Magistrate under the section or to the Court of Session. Where the trial was completely held by the Magistrate as a second class Magistrate but the higher powers were conferred only at the time of the judgment there is no doubt that the appeal lies to the District Magistrate.² Similarly, where most part of the trial is held by the Magistrate as a first class Magistrate as for example when, after examining eight prosecution witnesses as second class Magistrate two more prosecution witnesses are examined and charge framed and the case concluded as a first class Magistrate, the appeal lies to the Court of Session.³ Also in cases where only a small part of the trial is held by the Magistrate as a first class Magistrate,⁴ the appeal has been held to lie to the Court of Session, apparently on the ground that if any part of the trial is held by the Magistrate as a Magistrate of the first class and the case has been concluded by him, it must be considered to be a trial held by a Magistrate of the first class. The Madras High Court in Venkatareddi v Ramayya,⁵ seems to be of the opinion that a conviction by a first class Magistrate and not the trial is the determining factor. See also the under mentioned case⁶ of the Bombay High Court to a similar effect. It is submitted this is against the current of authority in India. See also S 39, Note 2 and S 410, Note 2.

Where a second class Magistrate submits a case under S 349 to a first class Magistrate, an appeal from the sentence of the first class Magistrate falls under S 403 and not under this section, although the first class Magistrate passes his sentence without taking further evidence and so the trial should be considered to have been held by the second class Magistrate.⁷

3 Appeals from the Bench of Magistrates of the second class — Where a trial Bench is composed of Magistrates of the second class but is invested, as a Bench with first class powers, appeals from the decisions of the Bench lie to the Sessions Judge and not to the District Magistrate.¹

appeals¹ and, again, only such appeals as lie to him "under this section," that is to say, appeals from convictions. He cannot transfer any other class of appeals from his Court under this sub-section². Nor will the power to hear appeals on transfer render the Court of the first class Magistrate, the Court to which appeals "ordinarily lie" within the meaning of s. 195 (3). The Court of the District Magistrate will continue to be such Court notwithstanding that appeals under s. 407 may be presented to a subordinate Magistrate's Court under the sub-section³.

The power of withdrawal of appeals vested in the District Magistrate can be exercised at any time even though an appeal may be part heard before the subordinate Magistrate⁴. Once an appeal is withdrawn the District Magistrate becomes solely responsible for the disposal of the appeal and he is not bound by any opinion formed or recorded by the subordinate Magistrate prior to the withdrawal as to the necessity of examining further evidence in the case⁵.

1 Scope — Section 408 is a general provision conferring a right of appeal in the cases mentioned therein. The section, however, must be read subject to the exceptions and modifications embodied in subsequent sections viz, sections 412 413 and 414¹. See also the undermentioned case².

2 'Convicted on a trial.' — The section confers a right of appeal on a person convicted on a trial and hence the absence of a sentence as in cases where he is dealt with under S 502 does not affect his right of appeal¹. See also S 407, Note 1.

3 "Trial held by" — As to whether trial includes judgment see S 410, Note 2 and S 404 Note 1a.

As to an appeal from a conviction where a second class Magistrate is invested with higher powers in the course of the case see Note 2 on S 407 and Notes on S 39. See also S 404 Note 1a.

The word trial in this section is not confined to a trial with the aid of assessors only. It applies to a trial either with the assessors or with the aid of a jury¹.

4. Sentence under section 349 — In a case submitted by an inferior Magistrate under S 349 for severer punishment the District Magistrate or the Sub-divisional Magistrate to whom it is submitted cannot pass a higher sentence than he is empowered to inflict under Ss 32 and 33¹ See proviso to sub s (2) of S 349 Again S 30 authorizes the Provincial Government to empower the District Magistrate or any Magistrate of the first class to try, as a Magistrate all offences not punishable with death Now, suppose the Magistrate to whom proceedings are submitted under S 349 is a Magistrate empowered under S 30 can he pass a sentence more severe than he is empowered to inflict under Ss 32 and 33? It has been held that he cannot do so, that in such a case the said proviso to S 349 will prevail and that even should the Magistrate sentence him to imprisonment for a term exceeding four years, the appeal will lie not to the High Court under proviso (b) to S 408 but only to the Court of Session²

5 Order or sentence under section 380 — The amendment of 1923 making an order or sentence under S 380 appealable to the Court of Session has given legislative sanction to the view expressed to that effect in the undermentioned case¹

6 Court of Session — Where, in a district there are two sessions divisions an appeal from a conviction by a Magistrate having jurisdiction over the whole district lies to the Sessions Judge of the division within which the headquarters of the Magistrate are situate, irrespective of the place of offence¹

Where a sessions division covers two districts an appeal to the Sessions Court can be heard in any one of the places It is a matter of discretion for the Sessions Judge when the matter comes before him on appeal, to decide in which district it shall be heard²

In Agency Tracts to which the Code of Criminal Procedure is extended an appeal from the Agency Magistrate of the first class lies to the Sessions Judge of the Agency Tracts and not to the non agency Sessions Judge³

The Code being extended to British Baluchistan a Court of Session in the said territory has all the powers in respect of appeals as are conferred by the Code⁴ A sentence of the Justice of the Peace under the Merchant Seamen's Act (1 [1] of 1859) is appealable to a Court of Session⁵

7 Proviso (b) — This proviso says 'all or any of the accused convicted at such trial' An appeal therefore by an accused person sentenced for a term not exceeding four years will lie to the High Court¹ even though no appeal has been preferred by another

The "sentence" in proviso (b) has reference only to the substantive sentence of imprisonment apart from any sentence of whipping or fine or imprisonment in default of fine³

When a Magistrate empowered under S 30 of the Code passes a sentence referred to in this proviso, the appeal lies only to the High Court⁴. Where, however, the Magistrate is not so empowered⁵ or has not acted in exercise of such powers⁶ the appeal will lie only to the Court of Session

Where an Assistant Sessions Judge convicts and sentences an accused for a term less than four years an appeal lies only to the Court of Session and the fact that at the time of the appeal the Assistant Sessions Judge himself became the Sessions Judge will not give a right of appeal to the High Court⁷

Where a District Magistrate appointed as a special officer to try a criminal case in a Native State, convicts and sentences the accused for the term mentioned in proviso (b), no appeal will lie to the High Court as he did not act as a Magistrate of the first class under the Code⁸

The power of the Sessions Judge to make over an appeal to an Additional Sessions Judge is not confined to appeals arising within his territorial jurisdiction but extends also to appeals which might have been transferred to the Sessions Judge by the High Court.²

The Sessions Judge has power to transfer any appeal he likes to the Court of the Additional Sessions Judge including an appeal from an order under S 195³

A Judge of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind sitting in a Sessions trial is a Sessions Judge for the purposes of this section⁴ The High Court of Bombay has power to hear appeals from a conviction by the Agent of Mewar under the special jurisdiction conferred on the said High Court by Rule 41 of the Bombay Act 2 (II) of 1846⁵ The High Court of Calcutta has no jurisdiction to hear appeals from Chittagong Hill Tracts as those tracts have been removed from the operation of the existing civil and criminal jurisdiction⁶ imprisonment, and does not include the imprisonment which may be contingent on default of payment of fine¹ A substantive sentence of imprisonment for a term of six months cannot, therefore, be combined with any term of imprisonment imposed in default of payment of fine for claiming a right of appeal² Where the sentence does not contain any one of the punishments specified in the section, no appeal lies³ Concurrent sentences against the accused in the same trial cannot be aggregated to bring the case under the section⁴

In a case where a Presidency Magistrate proceeds under S 562 and passes an order for release of the accused on furnishing security for good behaviour thereunder the question arises whether an appeal lies from such an order It has been seen in Note 1 to S 407 that the absence of a sentence is no bar to an appeal from a conviction which underlies an order under S 562 But under the strict terms of S 411 no appeal can lie from a conviction by a Presidency Magistrate unless it is accompanied by one or the other of the sentences specified in the section The answer, therefore in the case under consideration is that no appeal lies⁵

Where the sentence, one of imprisonment, is within the appealable limit an appeal lies although the offender is ordered to be confined in a juvenile jail⁶

(3) Notwithstanding anything elsewhere contained in any Act or Regulation, an appeal under this section shall be heard by a Division Court of the High Court composed of not less than two Judges, being Judges other than the Judge or Judges by whom the original trial was held, and if the constitution of such a Division Court is impracticable, the High Court shall report the circumstances to the Provincial Government which shall take action with a view to the transfer of the appeal under section 527 to another High Court

(4) Subject to such rules as may from time to time be made by His Majesty in Council in this behalf, and to such conditions as the High Court may establish or require, an appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council from any order made on appeal under sub-section (1) by a Division Court of the High Court in respect of which order the High Court declares that the matter is a fit one for such appeal.

a This section was newly inserted by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 1943 (26 [XXVI] of 1943) Section 2

1 Scope of the section — This section is new and was inserted into the Code by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act, 26 [XXVI] of 1943. It gives a right of appeal against conviction or acquittal in a trial held by a High Court in the exercise of its original criminal jurisdiction. The right of appeal against conviction is absolute when the ground of appeal involves a matter of law. But the leave of the appellate Court or a certificate of the trial Judge that it is a fit case for appeal is necessary when the ground involves any other matter such as a matter of fact. But such leave or certificate is quite essential in respect of an appeal against acquittal whether the appeal involves a matter of law or of fact.

The section also provides for an appeal against sentence with the leave of the appellate Court.

The right of appeal conferred by this section is a substantive right and not a mere matter of procedure. The section has therefore no retrospective operation.¹

2 Leave or certificate, when should be granted — Under this section leave or certificate should be granted only when it is thought that had the verdict been given by a competent jury it would have been a fit case for a successful reference to the

Emperor* (A person convicted on a trial held by a High Court in exercise of its original jurisdiction prior to the coming into force of the Amending Act cannot take advantage of the provisions of S. 411A.)

High Court under S 307 of the Code, and not merely because on the evidence it is possible to take a view different from that taken by the jury¹

3 Powers of appellate Court — Under S 418, where the trial is by jury before a mofussil Court an appeal lies on a matter of law only and, in such a case the High Court can under S 423 (2), reverse the verdict of the jury only if there is misdirection in the charge or misunderstanding by the jury of the law laid down by the Judge. But the powers of a High Court under this section are not so restricted inasmuch as the section empowers a High Court to hear appeals on matters of fact as well as of law notwithstanding anything contained in Ss 418 and 423 (2). Thus, the High Court can in appeal under sub s (1) (b) of this section on a matter involving a question of fact, set aside the verdict of the jury if on a consideration of the facts and all the circumstances of the case it is convinced that the verdict is unreasonable¹. But, although the powers of interference under this section are very wide, it does not necessarily follow that the High Court is bound to exercise it indiscriminately in every case². The general considerations on which the appellate Court has to act under the section are practically the same as those under S 307 of the Code and since even after the introduction of this section the jury remains the sole arbiter of facts and the Judge is still bound by the unanimous verdict of the jury the appellate Court ought to give due weight to its verdict³. Thus where a verdict is based mostly on appreciation of oral evidence, the appellate Court should be slow to interfere when the jury has unanimously disbelieved the witnesses whose testimony is not beyond criticism⁴.

Where the presiding Judge gives a certificate of fitness for appeal due regard must of course be given to his implied opinion that the verdict is wrong. But even then the test for interference remains the same as in a case under S 307 where the Judge disagrees with the verdict and submits the case to the High Court for the ends of justice⁵.

412. Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, where an

No appeal in certain cases when accused person has pleaded guilty and has been convicted by [a High Court], a Court of Session or any pleads guilty

Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class on such plea, there shall be no appeal except as to the extent or legality of the sentence

a These words were inserted by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 1943 (26 [XXVI] of 1943) Section 3

1 Scope of bar under the section — The principle underlying the provision is that a plea of guilty by the accused person operates as a waiver of his right to question the legality of the conviction based on such a plea.¹ But, before the bar of this section can be applied against a convicted person, the plea of guilty must be really such a plea. For instance, a plea which only amounts to an admission of facts alleged and not of the offence,² or a plea of guilty based on a misconception of the law of criminal liability,³ or on a misconception of one's right in property,⁴ or in answer to a charge defectively framed and not properly explained to the accused,⁵ or a plea of guilty obtained by trickery,⁶ is really a plea of not guilty. Again it is only in cases where the Court has accepted the plea of guilty and has convicted the accused person on such plea that the right of an appeal from the conviction is taken away.⁷ But once the Court has in its discretion accepted the plea such discretion cannot afterwards be attacked as improperly exercised so as to affect the provisions of this section.⁸

A plea of guilty with regard to previous convictions equally precludes the appellate Court from re-opening the question of the previous convictions in appeal.⁹

As a rule, an appeal cannot be admitted on the question of sentence only. But this section creates an exception to the rule in cases where the conviction has taken place on an admission of guilt by the accused person.¹⁰ In the latter case, the accused is entitled to question in appeal the sentence of the lower Court and the sentence only, either on the ground that the extent of the sentence is beyond what the circumstances of the case required or that the sentence is illegal as not authorized by law.¹¹ Where on the plea of guilty of the accused the Court, proceeding under Section 562 of the Code, releases him on recognizance and passes no sentence at all, the right of appeal is absolutely barred.¹²

Court cannot strike out the added sentence and decline to go into the merits of the whole appeal on the ground that the original sentence was not appealable¹

Where a trial is commenced before a second class Magistrate and after the conclusion of evidence he is invested with first class powers a sentence of fine not exceeding fifty rupees passed by such Magistrate is one passed by a first class Magistrate and is not appealable under this section²

5 "Sentence of fine" — An award of compensation under s 29 of the Cattle trespass Act 1 [I] of 1871 is not a sentence of fine within the meaning of this section³ Similarly an order under s 546 of the Code directing payment to the complainant of the court fee paid by him on his complaint was held not to be a sentence of *fine*⁴ In such cases the fact that the amounts are to be collected as if they were fines is immaterial

The provisions of this section have application to an appeal against a sentence passed under s 490 in view of the provisions of s 496 (2) of the Code Hence where a sentence of fine of Rs 10 has been imposed by a first class Magistrate no appeal lies against the sentence⁵

1 Legislative changes — The words of imprisonment not exceeding three months only or after the words passes a sentence and the words or of whipping only at the end of the section were omitted by the Criminal Law Amendment Act 12 [XII] of 1923. By these amendments cases in which a sentence of imprisonment or whipping has been passed have been made appealable¹

2 European British subjects — Under S 416 of the Code now repealed it was laid down that the provisions of S 414 did not apply to European British subjects¹

3 "Magistrate empowered to act under section 260" — This section embodies another exception to the right of appeal. It takes away the right of appeal in cases tried summarily under S 260 of the Code where the sentence is one of fine not exceeding Rs 200 only¹. The restriction in this section applies only to convictions by a Magistrate or a Bench of Magistrates of the first class to whom alone S 260 has reference². Any conviction therefore by a Bench of Magistrates of the second or third class is appealable under S 407 and is not affected by this section³.

The jurisdiction to try a case summarily must be validly exercised. A Magistrate cannot deprive an accused person of his right of appeal by trying a case summarily without having the power to do so⁴.

As to the constitution and powers of a Bench of Magistrates see S 15

4 "Passes a sentence of fine" — The bar under this section operates only when the specific non appealable sentence mentioned in the section is awarded. Where therefore, no sentence is passed at all, as for example, an order under S 562 is passed,¹ this section has no application and an appeal lies from the conviction. See also Notes on S 407. So also, when the sentence is any other than of a "fine not exceeding Rs 200 only," the right of appeal is not taken away. It has been held that a sentence of fine of Rs. 50 coupled with suspension of licence under the Motor Vehicles Act is not a sentence of fine only within the meaning of this section and an appeal is not barred.² This view, however, does not seem to be correct: see S 415, Note 1. To a case where, in addition to a non appealable sentence, a further order to furnish security for good behaviour is passed, this section has no application.³ But an order of confiscation under the Excise Act in addition to a non appealable sentence has been held not to make the case appealable.⁴

5. Combination of sentences — See Section 415, Note 1

415. "An appeal may be brought against any sentence referred to Proviso to sections in section 413 or section 414^a [by which any punishment 413 and 414 therein mentioned is combined with any other punishment] but no sentence which would not otherwise be liable to appeal shall be appealable merely on the ground that the person convicted is ordered to find security to keep the peace.

Explanation — A sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of fine is not a sentence by which two or more punishments are combined within the meaning of this section.

^a These words were substituted for the words 'by which any two or more of the punishments therein mentioned are combined' by the Repealing and Amending Act, 1945 (6 [VI] of 1945) S 3 and Second Schedule already been seen in Note 2 on S 413 that S 415 is intended by the Legislature as a proviso or an explanation to Ss. 413 and 414. Section 415 was not altered by the Amending Act of 1923 and remained as it stood before. Sections 413 and 414 were amended in 1923. In understanding the meaning of S 415 as it stood prior to the amendment of 1945 above referred to, it will be necessary to notice how the law stood under Ss. 413 and 414 before their amendment in 1923. The old S 413 laid down that no appeal lay in cases in which a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding one month only or of fine not exceeding Rs. 50 only or of whipping only was passed. The old S 414 also contained the same three kinds of alternative punishments. It followed that if each of the two sections barred an appeal only in case there was a sentence, either of a petty imprisonment only or of a petty fine only or of whipping only, the right of appeal was not taken away when any two or more of the alternative punishments were jointly awarded, though each of the said punishments, taken by itself, was of the extent not appealable under the said sections¹. This position was only made clear in S 415. The words "any two or more of the punishments therein mentioned" in that section as it stood prior to the amendment of 1945, were clearly referable to any two or more of the punishments of imprisonment, fine and whipping mentioned in Ss. 413 and 414 as they stood before the amendment in 1923.

Now, by virtue of the amendment in 1923, the punishment of whipping is taken out of S 413 and whipping as well as imprisonment are taken out of S 414. But the words "any two or more of the punishments therein mentioned" were retained in S 415. In view of the fact that now S 414 mentions only one punishment, what is the meaning of the words "any two or more of the punishments therein mentioned" in S 415 as it stood prior to the amendment of 1945? It could very well be urged that those words, while meaning punishments of the two kinds mentioned in S 413, also included several punishments of the same kind mentioned in Ss. 413 and 414. This view derived support from the fact that Ss. 413 and 414 say that no appeal lies from a sentence of fine, etc. thus implying that if there are two or more sentences of fine, etc. the bar will not apply. When there were two or more such sentences, it did not matter if the aggregate of those sentences did not exceed the limits of duration or amount fixed by Ss. 413 and 414. It was thus held by the Chief Court of Oudh² that a person convicted under S 417 of the Penal Code and S 24 of the Cattle trespass Act, and fined Rs. 50 and Rs. 20 respectively by a Magistrate in the exercise of summary powers was not deprived of the right of appeal by the terms of S 414 on the ground that two punishments of the nature mentioned in S 414 have been combined. In a Calcutta case,³ the High Court accepted the contention that S 413 mentions only a sentence of fine, etc., and does not, therefore, affect a case of two or more sentences of fine. In the later Calcutta cases⁴ however, the above contention was rejected and it was held that two sentences of fine must in the aggregate, be above Rs 50 in order to avoid the bar of s 413. This view was also held by the Allahabad,⁵ Bombay⁶ Madras⁷ Nagpur⁸ and Patna⁹ High Courts and by the Sind Judicial Commissioners Court¹⁰. The above conflict of decisions is now set at rest by the amendment of this section by Act 6 [VI] of 1915 which makes it clear that the section only applies where any other punishment than one mentioned in s 413 or s 414 is combined with such punishment.

A combination of sentences will give a right of appeal only if the sentences are in the same trial and not in *separate cases*¹¹.

On the question whether concurrent sentences of imprisonment can be aggregated under s 415 for escaping the bar of s 413 and s 414 (as it stood before the amendment of 1923) there was a difference of opinion. In some cases it was held¹² that such sentences could not be aggregated and in others that they could¹³. The amendment in 1923 of s 35 of the Code has now settled the point by upholding the former view.

Where the sentence is of a fine of Rs 45 and disqualification to hold licence under the Motor Vehicles Act, the sentence is not appealable, as the order of disqualification cannot be specified under s 367 (2) of the Code¹⁴.

2 Order for security to keep the peace — The section says that the fact of a convicted person being ordered to furnish security to keep the peace will not alter the non appealable nature of the sentences mentioned in ss 413 and 414¹. In a case decided by the Rangoon High Court² where in a summary trial an accused person was convicted and sentenced to three months imprisonment and was also ordered to give security for good behaviour under s 31A of the Rangoon Police Act it was held that an appeal lay

1. Scope and object — This section was newly introduced by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 18 [XVIII] of 1923. It was intended to remove doubts that previously, in appealable and non-appealable cases, the Courts was passed was also entitled to appeal,¹ and in other cases it was held that such accused had no right of appeal.² The controversy is now set at rest by the enactment of S 415A which recognizes the right of appeal on behalf of an accused person against whom a non-appealable sentence is passed in a trial in which an appealable judgment is passed against any of the accused persons.³

The Sind Judicial Commissioners Court has held that the words 'appealable judgment' and 'right of appeal' in the section should be read together and that the extent of the right of appeal is the same in the case of all the co-accused. So where an appealable judgment is passed against A and there is no appealable judgment against B and A is entitled only to appeal as regards his sentence and not as regards his conviction B can also only appeal as regards the sentence, if any, passed against him and cannot appeal as regards his conviction⁴ But the Rangoon High Court has held that the section confers a general right of appeal and that although the co accused (by virtue of whose right of appeal the other accused gets his right of appeal) can only appeal as to his conviction and not as to his sentence the other accused can appeal as to both⁵

1a Sections 415A and 411 — A and B are jointly tried and convicted by a Presidency Magistrate A is sentenced to six months imprisonment and B is dealt with under S 562 without any sentence being passed against him A is not entitled to appeal under this section because under the terms of S 411 there being no sentence against B, there is no appealable judgment against B (A himself cannot appeal because the sentence against him is not of the appealable level)¹

2 Sections 415A and 412 — A and B are jointly tried and both are convicted on their plea of guilty But no sentence is passed on A and he is dealt with under S 567 But an appealable sentence is passed against B Can A appeal? No the reason is that B himself can only appeal as to the extent or legality of the sentence passed against him and A's right of appeal cannot be more extensive than that of B and as no sentence at all has been passed against A, he cannot appeal²

1 Scope and applicability of the section — Section 407 of the Code of 1861 prohibited appeals from a judgment of acquittal of any criminal Court and an order of acquittal was therefore, conclusive¹ The extraordinary remedy of an appeal against an acquittal received a statutory recognition for the first time in 1872² in the interests of public safety, peace and order³

But the Legislature has by no means overlooked the fact that an appeal against an acquittal is an exception to the general principle of criminal law and is one which needs considerable safeguarding Such safeguards are three in number namely —

(a) that the right of appeal shall be exercised by the Provincial Government only,

(b) that every such appeal shall be made through the Public Prosecutor

(c) that every such appeal shall be tried by the High Court only

Before, therefore a person acquitted can undergo any further trial for the offence of which he has been acquitted the highest executive authority must hold that it is desirable the highest legal authority must advise that it is legal and proper and the highest judicial authority must find that it is just that the order should be set aside⁴

The object of the section is only to enable the Provincial Government to have a wrongful acquittal converted into a conviction or to have a re trial and not to enable it to obtain from the High Court opinions on abstract questions which do not arise on the facts established⁵

The provisions of this section are not qualified by any restriction which may be derived from a consideration of the terms of S 414, an appeal will, therefore, lie against an order of acquittal in a case tried summarily under S 260⁶ This section does not control the powers of the High Court under S 489⁷ This section is inapplicable to cases of orders of acquittal passed by special Magistrates under Bengal Act 12 (XII) of 1932 under which there is no right of appeal to the High Court⁸

In an appeal against an order of acquittal, it is for the Government to show that the judgment appealed against is wrong⁹

An order of acquittal made without jurisdiction may be set aside in appeal under this section¹⁰

2. "The Provincial Government" — It is only the Provincial Government that can prefer an appeal under this section¹ The object of limiting the right of appeal against acquittals to the Provincial Government is to prevent personal vindictiveness from seeking to call in question judgments of acquittal by way of appeal, and to ensure that such interference shall take place only in cases where there has been a miscarriage of justice so grave as would induce the Provincial Government to move in the matter²

Consequently a private person has no right of appeal under this section³. But so far as the wording of this section is concerned, there is nothing in it to show who can move the Provincial Government to direct an appeal under this section. It is a matter of practice that the Provincial Government is and can be moved by private individuals or by the Police through the District Magistrate or by the latter himself as the head of the criminal administration in his district⁴.

3 "May direct" — The power given to the Provincial Government by this section is of an exceptional and unusual character. It should be sparingly used¹ and with circumspection² care and caution³. It is a special weapon intended for exceptional occasions and which is to be only used after most anxious consideration and in cases which are themselves of great public importance or in which a principle is involved, it cannot be expected that the Government will dull the edge of that statutory provision by utilizing it freely in cases which are of no or little general interest⁴. this section should be limited to those instances in which there is a grave miscarriage of justice⁵ or where it is required in the interests of justice and of the public⁶

The exercise of the discretion is not subject to control by the High Court and cannot be questioned in dealing with such appeals⁷

Can an appeal under this section be preferred by the Provincial Government against an order of acquittal when an appeal preferred by the accused against his conviction has already been heard and decided by the High Court? This question can only arise in cases where an accused person is acquitted of a graver charge but convicted of a lesser charge on the same facts. In such a case, both the Provincial Government and the accused person have a right of appeal. If both the appeals are preferred they should ordinarily be heard together, but if the appeal of the accused person is heard and decided by a High Court before the Provincial Government has appealed, is the appeal of the Provincial Government barred? A Full Bench decision of the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court⁸ has held, overruling the view of the same Court in an earlier case,⁹ that an appeal against an acquittal for a major offence can be preferred by the Provincial Government although an appeal preferred by the accused against his conviction for a minor offence has been heard and decided by the High Court. But, where the appeal by the accused is pending hearing, it should be postponed, if in the opinion of the standing counsel for the Government it is likely that the Government will appeal against the acquittal so that both may be heard together. But it need not be postponed if there is only a possibility that the Government may desire to appeal.

4. "Public Prosecutor."—Under this section, it is the Public Prosecutor that is to be directed to present an appeal to the High Court. The term "Public Prosecutor" is defined in clause (i) of S. 4 (1) of the Code. Section 492 provides for the appointment generally or in any case or for any specified class of cases, one or more officers called 'Public Prosecutors'." Therefore, an appeal against an acquittal presented to the High Court by the Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, Bengal, who by Notification has been appointed by the Provincial Government to be, by virtue of his office, Public Prosecutor in all cases heard by the High Court of Bengal in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, is not incompetent.² But the Legal Remembrancer of Bengal cannot be deemed to be the Public Prosecutor for the Province of Behar, from the mere fact that he has been directed by the Government of Behar and Orissa to present such an appeal without his being appointed as such and when there is already a Public Prosecutor for the Province of Bihar.³

5 "High Court" — An appeal under this section lies only to the High Court. So a District Magistrate¹ or a Deputy Magistrate² or a Sessions Judge³ has no right to entertain an appeal against an order of acquittal.

6 Order of acquittal — The words 'conviction' and 'acquittal' are not applied in the Code to an order under s 118 and are inapplicable to it. Therefore, an order of a Sessions Judge setting aside the order of a Magistrate calling upon a person to furnish security for good behaviour is not an order of acquittal within the meaning of this section so as to enable the Provincial Government to prefer an appeal under this section.¹

An order dismissing the complaint for the non appearance of the complainant under s 217 is an order of acquittal within the meaning of this section.² So also an order according sanction to compound an offence under s 345 amounts to an order of acquittal by force of the words 'shall have the effect of an acquittal' in sub s (6) of that section and hence an appeal under this section lies against such order.³

The words appellate order of acquittal mean and include all orders of an appellate Court by which a conviction is set aside.⁴

the same trial, he was convicted of a less serious charge⁵ So, where an accused charged with a serious charge is acquitted of that charge but is convicted of a less serious one it is open to the Government to prefer an appeal so far as the charge on which he was acquitted is concerned⁶ The view held in the undermentioned cases⁷ that an 'acquittal' means a complete acquittal on all the charges is no longer correct since the decision of the Privy Council in *Kishan Singh v Emperor*⁸

7. Interlocutory orders—There is no appeal provided against any interlocutory order So where a Sessions Judge declines to try a case on the ground of want of jurisdiction, there is no order of acquittal and no appeal lies against such an order¹ On the question whether it is open to the Government to prefer an appeal on an order of the Sessions Judge refusing to amend or add new charges there is a difference of opinion In Queen Empress v Vaji Ram,² Telang J, held that 'the appeal allowed was only from any original or appellate order of acquittal and the order refusing to allow additional charges is not an order which falls within those terms especially when it is not even an order which can be said to form the basis of the order of acquittal or a necessary condition of its tenability'

However, in Emperor v Stewart,³ while Rupchand Bilaram, A J C, agreed with this view of Telang J, Kincard, J C, held that although the section gives no power of appeal against an order refusing to amend charges if such order is followed by an original or appellate order of acquittal the Provincial Government may direct an appeal to be presented

1. Scope and applicability of the section — This section provides that an appeal will lie on a matter of fact as well as a matter of law, except where the trial is by jury in which case an appeal will lie on a matter of law only.

The section applies equally to all criminal appeals, whether made by the Provincial Government against an acquittal or made by accused person against a conviction¹. Thus, where in a jury case the Provincial Government preferred an appeal against an acquittal on questions of fact, it was held that the appeal was incompetent². But, in a case tried by a Judge with the help of assessors³ or by a Magistrate,⁴ it is competent for the Provincial Government to appeal against an acquittal both on the question of law and on the question of fact. The section does not in any way curtail the powers of the High Court to deal with questions of fact as well in a jury case in a reference under s 307⁵ or under s 374⁶ of the Code.

The section does not apply to cases tried by a jury in a High Court or a Court of Session under the provisions of chapter XXXIII of the Code. In those cases under s 449 an appeal lies to the High Court on a matter of fact as well as a matter of law. See s 419 and Notes thereunder.

The section does not confer a right of appeal from the verdict and judgment in a trial held at the sessions of the High Court⁷ But a Judge of the Sind Chief Court sitting in its Sessions Court jurisdiction is a Sessions Judge and an appeal lies to the Chief Court against a conviction recorded on a trial held before him sitting with a jury⁸ See also s 266, Note 4 Under s 411A an appeal now lies from the verdict and judgment in a trial held at the sessions of the High Court

2 Trial by jury. — An appeal under this section in cases tried by jury lies on matters of law only and the appellate Court cannot go into the facts of the case¹ Where facts are in issue the verdict of a jury is absolutely final and must be given effect to The section jealously guards the right of the accused to the finality of the verdict of the jury, so that an appellate Court cannot, by going into a question of fact, substitute its own opinion for the verdict of the jury.²

The words "where the trial was by jury" mean "where the trial was in fact held by jury' and not 'where the trial ought to have been held by jury' and, therefore, where the accused is tried by a jury in a case which ought to have been tried with the aid of assessors, trial will be treated as one by a jury and no appeal lies except on a matter of law.³ The contrary view held in the undermentioned decisions⁴ can no longer be considered to be good law.

Where an accused person is tried on one charge by a jury and on another charge by the Judge with the aid of the same jury as assessors an appeal will lie against conviction on the latter charge on a question of fact as well as on a question of law.⁵ In the undermentioned case⁶ it was held that where the charge tried by the jury and the charge tried by the Judge with the aid of the same jury as assessors are so connected together that if the facts relating to the former charge cannot be challenged, the conclusion will be irresistible that the conviction on the latter charge is properly made, the appellant can challenge the facts on which his conviction on the former charge is based. As appeals in cases tried by a jury can only be on a point of law every petition of appeal should state distinctly in what respect the law has been contravened. It is not for the Court to through the records and find out any illegality that may arise⁷

3 "On a matter of law only"—A misdirection or non direction by the to the jury is a matter of law. If the verdict has been influenced by evidence, which inadmissible or proceeds on no evidence at all, this is again a matter of law¹. Reception of inadmissible evidence which has not influenced the verdict does not the trial²

The sufficiency or otherwise of evidence is not a matter of law, whether the believes the evidence to be sufficient or not is a pure question of fact³

The explanation to the section recognizes another matter of law, namely: alleged severity of a sentence⁴. See also the undermentioned cases⁵

Where an appeal is presented through the officer in charge of the jail under s 420 and is dismissed summarily under s 421 no further appeal can be brought under this section. Nor does an appeal lie from the order of the High Court dismissing the previous appeal under s 421³. See also Note 9 on s 421.

2 Copy of judgment to accompany — Every petition of appeal should normally be accompanied by a copy of the judgment¹. The absence of a complete judgment in the record is however not a ground for refusing to entertain the appeal².

Where a petition of appeal is not accompanied by a copy of the judgment the appeal may be rejected³.

The Court may however in its discretion in proper cases dispense with the copy of the judgment⁴. Where three accused preferred a joint appeal with a single copy of judgment but furnished stamps necessary for three separate copies of judgment it was held that the Court should in exercise of the discretion dispense with separate copies of judgment and hear the appeal⁵. Similarly where the full order appealed against was furnished along with one of the connected applications it was held that the production of the judgment in other applications might be dispensed with⁶.

3 Who can present petition of appeal — Under the Code of 1872 there was no specific provision as to who should present an appeal and it was held that any person authorized by the appellant could present it¹. Under the Code of 1887 and the present Code only the appellant or his pleader can make such presentation. The word pleader includes a mukhtear appointed with the permission of the Court² and he is entitled to present an appeal on behalf of his party. Presentation by a pleader's clerk is considered equivalent to a presentation by the pleader and is valid³. But a person who is not a pleader's clerk and one over whose conduct and action he has no control has no power to present an appeal on behalf of the party⁴. Where a petition of appeal on behalf of three accused was signed under a vakalat by their pleader but the presentation was made by another pleader who had a vakalat only from one of the accused it was held that the appeal should be treated as properly presented⁵.

Where two accused have conflicting interests they should not appeal through the same pleader⁶.

It is not necessary that a vakalat should be filed. A memorandum of appearance is sufficient to validate a presentation.⁷

4 Presentation to be in person — The presentation of a petition of appeal should be made in person. A petition put into a petition box kept for the convenience of the parties cannot be recognized for the reason that it could have been deposited there by a third party.¹ Nor can a petition be sent by post.² Where, however, the District Magistrate proceeded to treat a petition sent by post as if it was duly presented, it was held that it should not be dismissed without giving the petitioner an opportunity of being heard.³

5 To whom appeal should be presented — No specific provision has been made by the Code as to the person to whom an appeal is to be presented and the question, therefore, has been held to be merely one of administrative convenience and a presentation to an officer of the Court, such as a bench clerk, or to one of the Judges is not invalid¹

6 Contents of petition — A petition of appeal should not contain irrelevant, defamatory and scandalous expressions concerning the trying Magistrate. If it does it will be returned for expunging the objectionable matter.¹

In cases of trial by jury, the appeal can only be on a point of law and the appeal petition should state clearly what points of law have been contravened.²

Where an appellant, who has not got all necessary copies when presenting an appeal, reserves to himself liberty to bring forward additional points of appeal afterwards it is perfectly regular under such circumstances to raise such additional points by a supplemental petition³

A false statement made in a petition of appeal will not render the appellant liable for prosecution for making such false statement.⁴ See also section 342 note 31.

such a plea, though not taken in the memorandum of appeal, will be allowed to be raised at the hearing of the appeal⁵

7 Form of petition — Even if the prisoners wish to state no grounds for their appeal still their appeal must, according to law, be in the form of a petition.¹ There is no provision of law which requires the petitioner to verify the petition of appeal²

Where appeals are filed by several persons convicted by a single judgment in a joint trial, they should, according to the Judicial Commissioners Court of Nagpur be made separately³ The practice, in the Chief Court of Oudh seems to be that such persons can file a single appeal with a single copy of judgment⁴ The Lahore High Court has also held that a joint appeal is legal where the interests of the accused are common⁵

Where the memorandum of appeal alleges that one of the jurors was hard of hearing, another ignorant of English and unable to follow the arguments in Court such facts should be supported by an affidavit before the appeal comes on for hearing in time so that the Crown could make the necessary enquiries and file counter affidavit⁶

420.* If the appellant is in jail, he may present his petition of Procedure when appeal and the copies accompanying the same to the officer appellant in jail in charge of the jail, who shall thereupon forward such petition and copies to the proper appellate Court

1 "Copies accompanying the same" — A copy of the judgment should accompany appeals presented to jail officers under this section in the same manner as an appeal under s 419. Appeals not accompanied by such copies should not be forwarded to the appellate Court, but should be returned to the appellant¹. When a prisoner in jail applies through the Superintendent of the jail for a copy of judgment in order to prefer an appeal it is the Magistrate's business to procure and forward the copy applied for or to arrange that this should be done². See Note 2 on Section 419.

2 Presentation to the officer in charge of the jail. — The presentation to the officer in charge of the jail is good and sufficient whatever delay there may be in forwarding the petition to the appellate Court¹. Every facility such as pen, paper and ink should be given to the prisoner in jail to enable him to prepare his petition².

3 "Forward such petition and copies to the proper appellate Court"
 — A vacation Judge can hear and dispose of an appeal from jail¹. According to the Criminal Circulars issued by the Calcutta High Court, the officer in charge of the jail should not forward petitions of appeal from prisoners to the High Court in cases in which sentences or orders have already been passed by an appellate Court on appeal. In such cases parties should apply to the High Court by motion made by a pleader in open Court². According to the said Circulars the petition of appeal against sentences or orders passed by the Sessions Judge presented to officer in charge of the jail, should be forwarded by such officer direct to the High Court intimation of the fact being at once given to the Sessions Judge whose sentence or order is appealed against³. All communications from the officer in charge of the jail to the Sessions Judge relative to appeals of the prisoners to him should be made to the Judge direct and not through the District Magistrate who has no concern with the decision of the Sessions Judge in appeal and the appellate Court should certify its decision to the Magistrate from whose decision the appeal has been preferred and such Magistrate should inform the appellant in writing through the officer in charge of the jail of the result of the appeal⁴.

417. It shall be competent to the Appellate Court to reject the appeal if on a perusal of the petition of appeal and the copy of the sentence or order appealed against and after hearing the appellant or his counsel or agent if they appear the Court shall consider that there is no sufficient ground for questioning the correctness of the decision or for interfering with the sentence or order appealed against. Before rejecting the appeal the Court may call for and peruse any part of the proceedings of the lower Court, but shall not be bound to do so pleader, it considers that there is no sufficient ground for interference¹ The essential difference between the dismissal of an appeal under this section and its dismissal under S 423 is that in the latter case the appeal is disposed of after trial whereas in the former, the Court by summarily dismissing it refuses to *try it at all*² Even where an appeal has not been summarily dismissed, the Court is not precluded, when it hears the appeal under S 423 from deciding whether an appeal lies³

The provisions of this section apply both to appeals presented under S 417 against orders of acquittal and to other appeals⁴ As to whether this section applies to appeals under S 476B, see Note 4 on Section 476B

The appellate Court, while acting under this section cannot dispose of the appeal piecemeal So where an appellant was convicted at one trial on two separate charges, and the appellate Court admitted the appeal with regard to one charge and summarily dismissed the appeal with regard to the other it was held that the procedure though not illegal, was unusual and undesirable⁵

An appeal can be dismissed summarily only when the appellate Court considers that there is no sufficient ground for interfering Hence where the appellate Court considers that there is sufficient ground for interfering with regard to the sentence though not with the conviction it is not a case for summary dismissal of the appeal⁶ Nor can the appellate Court admit an appeal with restrictions Thus, it cannot admit an appeal with regard to sentence only⁷ The whole appeal will be open to consideration for the final hearing⁸ The reason is that the terms of the section exclude the possibility of partial summary dismissal e g in so far as the conviction is appealed against⁹

The Bombay High Court has held that when the High Court on a criminal appeal considers that the conviction should be maintained but that the sentence is too severe the difficulty of having to hear the entire appeal unnecessarily can be avoided by first reducing the sentence in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction and then dismissing the appeal summarily on the ground that there is no further cause for interference¹⁰

But it has been held that where the other points have been specifically considered and a definite order of dismissal on other points has been passed the whole appeal cannot be re opened again¹¹

While summarily dismissing an appeal under this section, an appellate Court cannot alter¹² or enhance¹³ or reduce¹⁴ the sentence or modify the order appealed from in any other way¹⁵

An appeal once admitted cannot be dismissed summarily under this section¹⁶

Unless an appeal is dismissed summarily, the appellate Court is bound to take notice under S 422 and to send for the record of the case under S 423¹⁷

The dismissal of an appeal temporarily, as for instance, the dismissal of an appeal till the decision of a civil suit, is unknown to law. If necessary, the appellate Court can postpone the decision of an appeal in a proper case¹⁸

2 "Shall peruse the same." — There is no provision in the Code for the dismissal of an appeal on account of the non appearance of the appellant or his pleader. The appellate Court is bound, even in the absence of the appellant or his pleader, to peruse the judgment and the record, if it has been sent for, and decide the appeal judicially¹

The section contemplates an appeal that can be properly put upon the file of the Court. Therefore, an appeal preferred out of time and without any explanation of the delay, may be dismissed at once,² but if the appellant is represented by a pleader, he should be given an opportunity of being heard in the matter of determining whether the delay should be excused and the appeal admitted.³

3. "May dismiss the appeal summarily." — The powers conferred by this section, on the appellate Court, should be exercised sparingly and with great caution¹ and with judicial discretion² Where important or complicated questions of fact and law are involved, or where disputed questions of title to immovable property are involved, the Court should not summarily dismiss an appeal but should send for the record and hear the appeal fully and decide³ It is however not illegal to do so⁴

The fact that the appeal of one co accused has been admitted does not take away the power of the Court to dispose of the appeal of another accused summarily⁵

4. "No sufficient ground for interfering" — Unless the Court is satisfied that there is no sufficient ground for interfering in accordance with the relief sought in the appeal, the appeal cannot be dismissed summarily under this section¹ As to whether the appellant is bound to satisfy the Court that there is sufficient ground for interfering with the conviction, see Note 14 on S 423

5 Right of appellant to be heard—Proviso —The proviso gives an appellant or his pleader, in cases of appeals filed under S 419, the right to a reasonable opportunity of being heard in support of the appeal¹ The proviso, by its words, restricts this right to cases coming under S 419 and, therefore, does not apply to appeals presented under S 420 from jail. Hence in the cases of jail appeals, the Court can summarily dismiss the appeal on perusal of the papers without calling upon the appellant to appear.² But although a convicted person presenting his appeal from jail has no right to be heard in person under this section still, whenever the appellate Court considers it desirable that the accused should be heard, it has power to direct the production of the prisoner before it for disposing of the appeal.³

Where, however, the appellant from jail has also preferred an appeal through a pleader the appellate Court is not competent to dismiss the appeal without giving the pleader an opportunity of being heard.⁴

Under the proviso, the opportunity that is to be given of being heard should be reasonable. Reasonable opportunity cannot be said to have been given to the appellant or his pleader in the following cases, viz:

- (1) Where the appellate Court calls upon the pleader to argue the appeal on the same day that it is presented, and refuses to grant him time to acquaint himself with the evidence in the case.⁵
- (2) Where on the presentation of a petition by a pleader, time is wanted for some other pleader to argue the case but the Court calls on him to argue it himself then and there.⁶
- (3) Where an appeal signed by a pleader is presented in person by the appellant and the Court without giving time for the pleader to come and argue the case, forthwith calls upon the appellant himself to argue.⁷

But there is nothing in the section to prevent the appellate Court from hearing the appellant's pleader at the time of presentation, if the pleader himself desires to do so. No further opportunity need be given in such a case.⁸

As to what is reasonable time, it has been held that at least a week's time should be given.⁹ Where an appeal was filed in the headquarters of an appellate Court on 26th July 1875 and notice was given for hearing on 28th July 1875 at a place many miles from the headquarters, it was held that the appellant was not given a reasonable opportunity¹⁰ Where a general notice was posted in the court-house, stating that appeals will be heard for admission only on the first Court day next after presentation, it was held that it was not in compliance with the section and a time should be fixed in each case and notice should be given to the appellant or his pleader, in such case¹¹

Where no notice at all is given to the appellant or pleader of the date to which the appeal is posted, it is a clear case where no opportunity has been given to be heard¹³. No notice to the Crown is necessary before dismissing an appeal against a conviction summarily.¹³

The further question arises whether, after the appellant or his pleader has been heard, and the Court then sends for the records of the case, the Court is bound to give opportunity to the appellant or his pleader to be heard again on the records. All that the section requires is that the pleader shall have a reasonable opportunity of being heard, before there is a summary dismissal, and once having heard him, it is not obligatory on the Court to hear him again when it sends for the record, though it may do so, if the Court or the pleader desires it¹⁴ But a contrary view, namely, that the Court is bound to hear the pleader a second time after the record is sent for and received has been taken in the undermentioned cases¹⁵ It is submitted that the view is not justified by the language of this section and is also against the weight of authority.

The right of being heard in support will include the right of reply¹⁶ as well as the right to refer to certified copies of the evidence.¹⁷ rejecting an appeal without calling for the records, such a course is, ordinarily, very inconvenient and should not be adopted.² A Court is not required to call for the records in an appeal in which the only question is a mere question of fact and the judgment of the Court below is so plain and clear that calling for the record would be a mere waste of time, but it is not right to reject an appeal summarily when a point of law which, on the face of it, is not without substance, has been raised or when the judgment is a long and intricate one requiring, obviously, careful consideration.³

A mere sending for the record under this section is not tantamount to an admission of the appeal, as the Court has power to dismiss an appeal under this section even after calling for the record.⁴

When sending for the record, the Court should note in the order-sheet the points for which it is sending for the record.⁵

7. Judgment and record of reasons — A Court, when dismissing an appeal summarily under this section, is not required to write a judgment in conformity with the provisions of S 367.¹

Although the law does not fetter the discretion of an appellate Court in dismissing appeals summarily and it can do so without recording any reasons for so doing,² it is advisable to record its reasons for summary dismissal, in view of the possibility of such an order being challenged by an application for revision, in which case they will show that the Court had really considered the points raised in the appeal and that the appeal was without foundation³ Therefore, though the appellate Court has power to dismiss an appeal summarily without giving reasons, if the High Court finds that the Court has not applied its mind to the consideration of the facts of the case, it will remand the case back to be heard on the merits⁴

Where it is not possible to serve the notice as under ss 69 and 70 the notice or a copy of it should under s 71 be left at the address given in the appeal. It is not competent to an appellate Court to hear and decide an appeal in the appellant's absence simply because he cannot be found at the address given by him³.

Where in spite of due notice having been given the parties or their pleaders fail to appear at the hearing of the appeal, but only appear on the date fixed for delivery of the judgment the appellate Court is not bound to hear them⁴.

Where in an appeal against an order of acquittal in respect of several accused notices were issued to all the accused but were served only on some of them it was held that the appeal could be heard in respect of those accused upon whom notices had been served⁵.

2 Notice to appellant or pleader. — Notice under this section must be given to the appellant or his pleader. Under s 279, the corresponding section of the Code of 1872 notice had to be given only to the appellant, the words 'or his pleader' being absent. It was therefore held that the fact that the pleader of the accused was present in Court when an order was made admitting an appeal did not relieve the Court from the necessity of giving notice to the appellant of the day fixed for the hearing of the appeal¹. Under the present section it is enough if notice is given to the appellant or his pleader.

3 Notice to accused — Under this section notice is necessary to the accused only in cases where there is an appeal against acquittal under s 411A (2) or under s 417. A notice to the accused person therefore, to whom compensation is ordered to be paid under s 250 is unnecessary¹. But seeing that he is the only person interested in upholding the order it is desirable that notice should be given to him². But the High Court will not interfere in revision on the ground of want of notice unless there is some illegality in the order³.

4 Notice to complainant-respondent — Under this section a complainant-respondent cannot claim as of right to be heard in the appeal. The matter is one which is left in each case to the discretion of the Court¹.

But it is not in any case bound to do so)

Though there is no provision in case of an order under S 515 of the Code with regard to notice to the complainant to whom compensation has been awarded one of the fundamental principles of law is that no order should be passed to the detriment or prejudice of a party without giving him an opportunity of being heard in defence. In that view notice should, in the exercise of the appellate Court's discretion be given to a complainant of the hearing of an appeal against a conviction in a case in which the complainant has been awarded compensation² Where notice of appeal has been given to complainant the Court should give him reasonable opportunity to engage a pleader and also give that pleader reasonable time to prepare his case. But the failure to give full opportunity to complainant is no ground for interference in revision when the order of acquittal passed by the appellate Court is proper³ So also the fact that notice of appeal was not served on the complainant respondent is no ground for interference where no injustice has been occasioned thereby⁴ See also Section 545 Note 16

The officer appointed by the Provincial Government in Bombay is the District Magistrate¹ In Bengal the officer appointed by the Provincial Government is the District Magistrate except where the order of a Sessions Judge is in appeal in which case the Sessions Judge is such officer² In the Punjab also it is the District Magistrate³ In Madras

Session;

- (4) The Agent and Manager of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway and the Agent of the South Indian Railway in appeals against convictions for Railway offences in connexion with those railways respectively,
 - (5) The District Forest Officer in appeals against convictions for forest offences, except in cases of offences relating to unreserved lands. In such cases notice shall be given to the Revenue Divisional Officer who ordered the prosecution,
 - (6) Officers of the Salt and Excise Department in charge of circles in appeals against convictions for Salt and Excise offences in their circles, and in appeals to the High Court in Abkari cases, to the Inspector of Excise, Madras Town Circle,
 - (7) The Crown Prosecutor for the Town of Madras in appeals to the High Court from the judgments or orders of the Presidency Magistrate and the Public Prosecutor in other appeals to the High Court
5. The Oudh Criminal Rules (1925)

Rule 3 As soon as the date is fixed, the appellate Court shall cause notice to be given to the appellant as well as to the District Magistrate who shall inform the appellate Court whether any one will appear to support the conviction

Rule 4. In all criminal appeals before Sessions Judges notice shall be given to Government Pleaders, whether such appeals be presented by pleaders or agents or received through the Superintendent of jails

Criminal Circulars of the Judicial Commissioner, Central Provinces (1929) :

Rule 10 The following are the officers to whom notices of appeal shall be given under S 422 of the Code :

- (1) The District Magistrate in all appeals filed before the Court of Session of Judicial Commissioner,
- (2) The Prosecuting Inspector or Sub-Inspector of Police in appeals to the District Magistrate's Court or to Courts of Magistrates subordinate to the District Magistrate

Where the District Magistrate is the officer who is to receive the notice and the appeal is filed in his Court and heard by himself no notice to him is necessary⁶ But where the appeal is transferred to a joint Magistrate for hearing the fact that it was originally filed before the District Magistrate does not relieve the joint Magistrate of his duty of giving notice to the District Magistrate⁷

An omission to issue notice to the Crown as required by this section is no ground for interference in revision with the appellate order at the instance of the complainant when the Crown supports the order of acquittal passed in appeal⁸ But an order of acquittal passed without notice to the Crown can be challenged in an appeal under Section 417⁹

6 Time and place of hearing — Under this section the notice should specify the time and place at which the appeal will be heard. The Court of appeal should fix a date for hearing and determine it on that day. Where the appeal was directed to be heard in January without fixing a date and the appeal was taken up and dismissed on a particular day without any information to the appellant as to the time of hearing it was held that the dismissal was improper¹ So also a notice to an appellant's pleader that his appeal would be heard next day wherever the Court happened to be encamped is not sufficient² An appeal posted for hearing at one place cannot be heard and dismissed at another place without giving notice to the appellant or his pleader of the change of place³ So also an appeal posted for hearing on a particular date cannot be heard on a date previous to that fixed⁴

Where a pleader appeared at 10 A M to argue the criminal appeal on the day notified for hearing and was informed that the appeal was disposed of on merits at 30 A M the appeal was ordered to be restored and re heard by some other Magistrate as the pleader did not appear to have wilfully absented himself⁵ See also the under mentioned case⁶

1. Scope of the section. — This section prescribes the powers of the appellate Court in disposing of an appeal. The powers conferred on the appellate Court are as ample as those of the High Court on revision s 439 with the exception of the power to enhance the sentence¹ Where the appellate Court is the High Court itself it has not only the powers under this section, but also those under S 439 As an appellate Court it can, under this section, alter the conviction to one for an offence of which the accused was acquitted by the lower Court but it has no such power in revision As a revision Court it can enhance the sentence passed by the lower Court though as an appellate Court it has no such power Thus by a combination of Ss 423 and 439, the High Court in appeal can convict the accused of an offence of which he had been acquitted and also enhance the sentence² Where an appeal is before the High Court the accused may be warned that at the hearing of the petition, he may be called on to show cause why the sentence should not be enhanced³ But the stage at which the revisional powers can be exercised does not arise until the peremptory provisions of Ss. 422 and 423 have been complied with thus the High Court cannot if it does not dismiss the appeal summarily under S 421, act under S 439 without notice under S 422 and without sending for the record under S 423⁴

There is another distinction between this section and S 439 Under the latter section findings of fact are not ordinarily open to review and a proviso against altering an acquittal into a conviction has been expressly added therein On the other hand this section is concerned with the powers of a Court of Appeal when the facts are before the Court and in the absence of a proviso limiting the powers as to alteration of findings such a proviso cannot be implied⁵

The powers of the Court under this section must be read subject to other provisions of law limiting the right of interference to the extent specified by such provision. See the undermentioned cases⁶

the question whether the appellant appears or does not appear, if he appears he is bound to be heard, if not, the record should be perused and the appeal disposed of on the merits.³

The whole record must be perused, it is not enough to merely go through the judgment.⁴ But documents and evidence not forming part of the record of the proceedings of the lower Court cannot be referred to or considered in appeal.⁴

An appeal cannot be dismissed on the ground that the sentence of the lower Court is without jurisdiction. Where a Magistrate first passed a non appealable sentence and then illegally corrected it into an appealable sentence, it was held that an appeal lay against the latter and could not be dismissed on the ground that the original sentence was non appealable.⁵

4 Dismissal of appeal for default, if can be set aside — See Notes on Section 430

5 Refusal to entertain appeal on ground that conviction ought to have been under non-appealable section — Where a conviction is given under an appealable section the appeal cannot be refused to be entertained because the conviction in the appellate Court's opinion, ought to have been under a non appealable section.¹

6. Admission of appeal does not preclude objection as to its admissibility — The mere fact that an appeal was admitted in the absence of the respondent does not preclude the appellate Court from entertaining and giving effect, at the hearing, to an objection as to the maintainability of the appeal. Thus, the appellate Court can entertain an objection that there was no sufficient cause under S 5 of the Limitation Act for excusing the delay in filing the appeal,¹ or an objection that no appeal lies against the particular sentence.² See also Section 421 Note 1

7. Appeal cannot be admitted merely for reviewing sentence. — An appeal cannot be admitted merely for the purpose of reviewing the sentence only. If the appeal is admitted the appellant is entitled to be heard on the merits of the whole case. Where this is not done the High Court will order a re hearing of the appeal.¹ See also Section 421, Note 1

8 Withdrawal of appeal—A petition of appeal presented for admission may be withdrawn by the appellant. The reason is that a right of appeal is a privilege and the party concerned is at liberty to insist upon or abstain from the exercise of that right in accordance with the principle that every privilege given to a party by law may be waived at the option of that party.¹ According to the unmentioned case² a party can withdraw his appeal at any time before judgment. According to the High Court of Calcutta³ it is doubtful if an appeal can be withdrawn as of right after the appellate Court has perused the evidence. A Full Bench of the Lahore High Court has held that once an appeal has been lodged and admitted it is not in the power of the appellant to withdraw the appeal nor in the power of the appellate Court to allow the appeal to be withdrawn.⁴

9 Parties must be given an opportunity of being heard—An appeal cannot be dismissed summarily under this section.¹ The stage at which the powers under this section are to be exercised arises after the notice referred to in S 422 has been given to the parties specified therein. The appellate Court must give the appellant or his pleader an opportunity of being heard.² It cannot dispose of the appeal immediately after sending for the record without giving any such opportunity.³ Thus it cannot dismiss the appeal without a hearing on the ground that the matter is a mere trifle.⁴

On the other hand where an opportunity has been given but the appellant or his pleader is absent at the hearing,⁶ or is not prepared to argue,⁶ the Court is not bound to wait further but is competent to dispose of the appeal on the merits after perusing the record. Thus, the only limitation on the powers of the appellate Court is that, before disposing of the appeal, it must peruse the record and, if the appellant, having been given an opportunity of being heard, is present or is represented by a pleader, he must be heard.⁷

Where a pleader appears on behalf of the appellant but files no vakalatnama, the appellate Court may grant him some time for producing the vakalatnama and then hear him, but the refusal to grant time cannot be said to be wrong.⁸ If the appellant is in jail and is unrepresented by a pleader, he is entitled to appear and be heard in person⁹ and, for this purpose, the appellate Court has power to direct him to be brought before it.¹⁰ A contrary view has, however, been taken by the Chief Court of Oudh,¹¹ namely, that an appellant in jail cannot appear in person in Court.

The only persons that are entitled to be heard are those mentioned in the section. A mukhtear is a pleader, and if he represents the appellant, he must be heard.¹² A complainant or a private prosecutor cannot claim, as of right, to be heard in appeal, though the Court may, in its discretion, hear him.¹³

The parties who are to be heard must be heard in each other's presence.¹⁴ The Court cannot cut short the arguments so long as the parties are not guilty of unnecessary repetition or of irrelevant arguments, nor can it decline to hear them or cut short their arguments because it is expected by the superior Courts to turn out a certain amount of work within a certain time.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether, if the respondent is heard, the appellant has a right of reply. According to the High Court of Calcutta¹⁵ the practice of the Court is to allow the appellant a right of reply. According to the High Court of Lahore¹⁶ there is nothing in the language of the section to preclude the appellant or his pleader from replying, and as a matter of principle such right must be conceded to him.

10 Notice of appeal — See Notes on Section 472

11. Connected appeals — Hearing of — An appellate Court should not hear two appeals together each appeal must be kept absolutely separate and dealt with on the merits¹ Further it is irregular for the Court while dealing with connected criminal appeals to make cross references to the evidence and judgments in the several cases² Where two parties were charged for their attacks against each other in the same occurrence, and the High Court though trying the two charges separately, gave a single judgment it was held by the Privy Council that although technically it would have been better to have kept the evidence entirely distinct and to have given two separate judgments, the irregularity was one which in the absence of prejudice would not affect the validity of the convictions³ Where the Sessions Court reversed the finding of the lower Court on a question of fact without discussing the evidence in the case but referring to his finding in the appeal in a counter case it was held that the procedure though convenient for the Sessions Judge raised difficulties when the case came before the High Court in revision for want of material for High Court and hence the case should be remanded⁴

12 Appointment of assessors in appeal — The appointment of assessors in appeal is not authorized by law¹

13 New plea — A plea of self defence can be raised for the first time in appeal and the appellate Court should examine the plea so raised¹ if the facts on the record justify such plea² Similarly a question of law such as that the prosecution is barred by limitation³ or that the trial is vitiated by an illegality⁴ (e.g. a misjoinder of charges⁵ or the constitution of the Court being illegal or irregular⁶) may be raised for the first time in appeal As a general rule however an objection as to the admissibility of evidence will

An alternative case cannot be raised by the prosecution for the first time in appeal from an acquittal⁹

14 Appreciation of evidence by the appellate Court — The appellate Court should exercise its own independent judgment in reviewing the evidence¹ and must form its own conclusions on the evidence² A general agreement with the lower Court is not enough³

A trial Court may give a finding of fact in two ways

(a) by drawing inferences from proved and admitted facts or

(b) by relying on the credibility of the evidence

This credibility may again depend upon the demeanour of the witnesses or upon other factors In case (a), the appellate Court is in as good a position as the first Court Even in case (b), where the credibility of the evidence depends upon factors other than the demeanour of witnesses the appellate Court is free to come to its own conclusions as to the trial Court⁸ Where the evidence has been properly appreciated by the lower Court and its view cannot be said to be wrong the appellate Court cannot interfere⁹

There is a difference of opinion as to whether the appellant is bound to show that the decision of the lower Court is wrong. On the one hand, it has been held that there is no such burden on the appellant. It is for the appellate Court as for the first Court to be satisfied affirmatively that the prosecution case is substantially true and that the guilt of the accused has been established beyond all reasonable doubt¹⁰. According to this view the presumption of innocence with which the accused starts continues right through until he is held guilty by the final Court of Appeal, this presumption is not strengthened by an acquittal or weakened by a conviction in the trial Court. The onus of proof is neither increased nor lightened by an order of conviction or acquittal¹¹.

On the other hand it has been held in the undermentioned case¹² that the presumption is that the lower Court's decision is correct. According to this view an appellant is not in the same position before an appellate Court as he is before the Court trying him, but must satisfy the appellate Court that there is sufficient ground for interfering¹³. It is submitted that the former view is to be preferred to the latter.

Where the whole of the prosecution evidence is disbelieved, a conviction by the lower Court in respect of two offences cannot be set aside as regards one offence and

15. Appeal from acquittal — Clause (a) — Section 407 of the Code of 1861 specifically provided, that 'there shall be no appeal from a judgment of acquittal passed in any criminal Court' This was in accordance with the old established principle of English law that a man once tried and acquitted for an offence is ipso facto protected from any subsequent proceeding for that offence, whether the subsequent proceeding is by the appellate or revisional Court

On grounds of public policy,¹ however, a right of appeal against an acquittal, subject to certain limitations, was for the first time recognised in this country by the Code of 1872.² An appellate Court will, however, hesitate and feel great reluctance in interfering with the finding of the Court below and coming to a different conclusion³ Where two views are possible on the evidence, an appellate Court will not interfere merely because it would sitting as a trial Court, have taken the other view⁴ unless it is shown that there has been some irregularity in procedure or some other serious defect which necessitates the re-examination of the entire evidence and a fresh conclusion⁵ Again, where the evidence against the accused is too scanty or insufficient,⁶ or where it is not established beyond all reasonable doubt that the respondent is guilty of the offence charged⁷ the appellate Court will not interfere with the acquittal. Nor will the finding of the trial Court be displaced merely because the Government's view of the case does not coincide with that of the trial Court⁸.

Except in regard to the points stated above, there is no distinction drawn so far as the sections of the Code themselves are concerned, between appeals from convictions and appeals from acquittals in regard to the rules and limitations applicable to them. It was, however, held in several decisions, that a distinction must be drawn as regards the powers of the appellate Court in dealing with an appeal from an acquittal and an appeal from a conviction⁹. Thus, it was held that the appellate Court had no jurisdiction to reverse an order of acquittal on a matter of fact except in cases in which the lower Court had obstinately blundered¹⁰ or had through incompetence stupidity or perversity reached distorted conclusions as to produce a positive miscarriage of justice¹¹ or had in some other way, so conducted itself as to produce a miscarriage of justice¹² or had obviously blundered,¹³ or its judgment was wrong and perverse¹⁴ or was

There is in their opinion no foundation for the view apparently supported by the judgments of some Courts in India that the High Court has no power or jurisdiction to reverse an order of acquittal on a matter of fact except in cases in which the lower Court has obstinately blundered or has through incompetence stupidity or perversity reached such distorted conclusions as to produce a positive miscarriage of justice or has in some other way so conducted itself as to produce a glaring miscarriage of justice or has been tricked by the defence so as to produce a similar result. Sections 417, 418 and 423 of the Code give to the High Court full power to review at large the evidence upon which the order of acquittal was founded and to reach the conclusion that upon that evidence the order of acquittal should be reversed.¹⁸ No limitation should be placed upon that power unless it be found expressly stated in the Code. But in exercising the power conferred by the Code and before reaching its conclusions upon fact the High Court should and will always give proper weight and consideration to such matters as (1) the views of the trial Judge as to the credibility of the witnesses (2) the presumption of innocence in favour of the accused a presumption certainly not weakened by the fact that he has been acquitted at his trial.¹⁹ (3) the right of the accused to the benefit of any doubt,²⁰ and (4) the slowness of an appellate Court in disturbing a finding of fact arrived at by a Judge who had the advantage of seeing the witnesses²¹ To state this, however, is only to say that the High Court, in its conduct of the appeal should, and will, act in accordance with the rules and principles well known and recognised in the administration of justice "

Where the lower Court, thinking whole trial illegal because of wrong joinder of charges, acquitted the accused, it was held that the order of acquittal should be set aside, the reason being that if the whole trial be illegal, there can be neither conviction nor acquittal.²²

In exercising its jurisdiction in the matter of appeals against acquittals, the High Court should confine its exercise to the particular acquittal complained of by the Government.²³

Where an accused is charged with a major offence but is convicted of a minor offence, he should be held to be acquitted of the major offence.²⁴ In such a case, if the Government appeal against the acquittal in respect of the major offence, it is open to the accused to ask the Court to consider all the evidence before it and to urge all possible grounds against conviction, and if the Court comes to the conclusion that the conviction even for the lesser offence is wrong, it can suo motu acquit the accused of that offence in the exercise of its powers under Section 439²⁵ order.³ The appellate Court may, if necessary, take additional evidence under Section 429.⁴

17. Appeal against acquittal—Power to order re-trial. — The power to order a re trial, whether in an appeal from a conviction or from an acquittal, is a discretionary one¹ A re trial should be ordered only where the trial is incurably defective so that even the taking of additional evidence under S 423 will not put the appellate Court in a position to dispose of the case satisfactorily² Thus, where the lower Court had acquitted the accused on a misconception of the law and did not examine the defence witnesses, a re trial was ordered on setting aside the acquittal³ Where the evidence disclosed some other offence than that of which the accused was acquitted, it was held that a re trial might be ordered⁴ See also the undermentioned case⁵

The discretion to order a re trial will not be exercised, where the case is not of sufficient consequence,⁶ or where there is no evidence on the record sufficient for conviction,⁷ or where no action was taken against the accused for a long time after the offence and the ordering of a re trial would result in the accused labouring under great difficulties in the conduct of his case,⁸ or where there has already been full inquiry into the facts and no further evidence is likely to be forthcoming.⁹

The fact that evidence had been discovered subsequent to the acquittal is not a ground for setting aside the acquittal or for ordering a re trial ¹⁰

An order for retrial can be passed even subsequent to the order setting aside the conviction and sentence.¹¹

Where, in an appeal against an order of acquittal, the High Court sets aside the order of acquittal but declines to order re trial, the prosecution still has power to prosecute the accused for the same offence.¹³

18 Re trial of appeals — An appeal is to all intents and purposes a trial¹ and consequently the word 're trial' will include the re trial of an appeal also. Where a person is acquitted in appeal by the Sessions Judge, the High Court on an appeal therefrom by the Provincial Government, can after reversing the acquittal order the appeal to be re tried².

19 "Find him guilty and pass sentence" — The appellate Court setting aside an order of acquittal may find the accused guilty of the offence charged, and pass sentence on him according to law³. The words 'find him guilty' are however, not limited to the offences of which the accused was accused in the lower Court: the appellate Court may find him guilty of all offences of which the trial Court could have found him guilty under the provisions of Ss 237 and 238 of the Code provided of course the accused is not prejudiced by the course adopted⁴. The fact that the trial was with the aid of assessors will not affect the power of the appellate Court to convict the accused for another offence under Ss 237 and 238 even though the opinion of assessors could not be taken in respect of such offence⁵.

Where the accused has had no legal trial he cannot be convicted and sentenced by the appellate Court. The only course open in such a case is to order a re trial⁶.

Where the accused is convicted in appeal the appellate Court may pass sentence according to law. Where the trial Court convicted the accused and awarded him one year's imprisonment and on appeal the accused was acquitted it was held in an appeal against such acquittal that the High Court if it set aside the acquittal had power to pass a severer sentence than that awarded by the trial Court though it must be within the powers of the trying Magistrate⁶.

Ordinarily in an appeal against an acquittal the appellate Court convicting the accused refrains from passing a capital sentence⁶.

20 Appeal from conviction—General — In an appeal from a conviction the appellate Court may adopt one of three courses according to the facts and circumstances of the case

- (1) It may reverse the finding and sentence and acquit or discharge the accused or order him to be re tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction subordinate to such appellate Court, or committed for trial.
- (2) It may alter the finding, maintaining the sentence, or with or without altering the finding reduce the sentence.
- (3) It may alter the nature of the sentence, but, subject to the provisions of s 106, sub s (3), not so as to enhance the same

It cannot simply remand the case directing that the lower Court should examine certain witnesses afresh and re submit the record to the appellate Court for decision of the appeal¹ Nor can it direct a further inquiry to be made²

Clause (b) cannot be taken to imply that, unless accompanied by a sentence a conviction, such as that under s 562 of the Code, is not open to appeal it is unnecessary to regard the section as an exhaustive statement of the powers of an appellate Court³

21 "Reverse the finding and sentence" — Where an appellate Court reverses the finding and sentence of the lower Court, it must adopt one of the three courses —

- (1) acquit or discharge the accused, or
- (2) order his re trial by a Court of competent jurisdiction, or
- (3) order his commitment for trial

A mere reversal of the conviction without adopting any of these courses amounts to an acquittal of the offence of which the accused was convicted in the trial Court¹

Before any of these courses is adopted, it is necessary that the finding of the lower Court should be reversed This reversal, however, does not amount to an acquittal within the meaning of section 403²

It was held in the undermentioned case³ that where the accused had been convicted of offence X and the appellate Court considered him guilty not only of that offence but also of offence Y it should confirm the conviction in respect of offence X and direct him to be tried for the other offence also by a Court of competent jurisdiction.

22 "Acquit or discharge the accused" — As has been seen already, an appellate Court reversing the conviction of the accused can acquit or discharge the accused¹

Where A and B are convicted by the trial Court and B appeals and is acquitted on the merits, it does not follow that A will necessarily have the benefit of the finding of the appellate Court² Where, however, the grounds of acquittal of B are common to A also, the position is different. In such cases, it has been held that the High Court as a Court of revision is entitled to set aside the conviction of A also, although he had not appealed from his conviction³. The appellate Court as such has not got this power⁴ but the High Court as the Court of revision has⁵.

Where A is acquitted and B is convicted by the trial Court and B appeals from his conviction, the appellate Court cannot interfere so as to affect the acquittal of A when there is no appeal against such acquittal⁶.

23 "Order him to be re tried"—Under the Code of 1872 where the trial Court was not one competent to try the case, the appellate Court was bound to order a re trial¹. Under the present section, where the appellate Court reverses the conviction of the accused, it may order him to be re tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction². The question, whether there should be a re trial is thus a matter of judicial discretion of the Court³. As a general rule an order for re trial would be proper where the trial in the lower Court has been *illegal, irregular or otherwise defective*⁴. In all serious cases where the first trial

- (5) where the defect consists in the admission of irrelevant evidence, but there is other evidence on the record sufficient to enable the Judge to decide the case¹³
 (6) where the only defect is that certain evidence has not been brought on the record which ought to have been, the appellate Court may, in such a case, itself take evidence under S 428 and decide the case¹⁵

Where there is no defect in the trial or irregularity in procedure, the mere fact that the appellate Court is unable to form an opinion as to whether the accused is to be convicted or acquitted,¹⁴ or that there is a chance that the prosecution may be able to produce better evidence,¹⁵ or that the appellate Court disagrees with the finding of the lower Court,¹⁶ is not a ground for ordering a re trial

Where the appellate Court ordered a new trial on the ground that although the accused were shown by the evidence to have committed some offence it was clear they had been convicted under a wrong section, and all the facts on which a conviction for any offence could be sustained had been put in issue before the trying Magistrate, it was held that before quashing the sentence and ordering a re trial, the appellate Court should have come to a certain conclusion as to the offence which the accused were shown by the evidence to have committed, and that it should have considered, whether if the evidence showed that the accused should properly have been convicted of another offence than that charged, they would be prejudiced by amending the conviction¹⁷

The words in clause (b) authorizing the appellate Court to order a re trial are wide enough to authorize a re trial from the point at which the error in the trial has been committed provided that the accused was not otherwise prejudiced²⁰

There is nothing preventing the appellate Court from directing a re trial on a fresh charge framed on the evidence already recorded²¹ However, the appellate Court cannot direct that the evidence already on the record should be treated as evidence in the case as it savours of an order for further inquiry which cannot be passed in appeals from convictions²² An order for re trial, again, cannot restrict the evidence to be taken to that

It is not safe to convict accused without taking such evidence — Acquittal not possible on evidence as it stands—Re-trial should be ordered)

Where a re trial is ordered it is open to the prosecution either to proceed or not to proceed as it may be advised²⁴

Where the circumstances of the case warrant an order for re trial the appellate Court should not simply dismiss the appeal or report the case to the High Court²⁵

Where a Magistrate tries a case which is exclusively triable by a Court of Session the trial is void there being in such cases no trial the appellate Court cannot order a re trial²⁶

24 "By a Court of competent jurisdiction" — The words order him to be re tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction do not imply that it is necessary before ordering a re trial that the original Court should have had no jurisdiction to try the case¹ The re trial may be ordered to be held by the original Court itself if it was competent to try the case² or by another Court of competent jurisdiction even where the original Court was itself a Court of competent jurisdiction³

The Court convicting the accused may be competent to try the case but not competent to adequately punish the accused for the offence In such a case the appellate Court reversing the conviction may order a re trial to be held by a Court which can adequately punish the accused⁴

There is nothing preventing the appellate Court from specifying the subordinate Court which should hold the re trial⁵

Can a re trial be ordered before the appellate Court itself? There is a difference of opinion on the point It was held by the High Court of Bombay in the undermentioned case⁶ that the re trial if ordered must be by a Court of competent jurisdiction subordinate to the appellate Court and that the appellate Court could not order the re trial to proceed before itself According to the High Court of Madras the words Court of competent jurisdiction subordinate to such appellate Court are not words of limitation and do not exclude the appellate Court if the offence is one within its jurisdiction⁷

Where in a case tried by jury in Court X the appellate Court reversed the conviction and sentence and ordered a re trial by Court Y which was competent to try the case with the aid of assessors it was held by the Privy Council that there was no legal objection to the order made but that the order was one which ought not to be made unless justified by exceptional circumstances inasmuch as it was likely to have very serious effects upon the rights of the accused and that his privilege which he had enjoyed of a trial by a jury, he ought in general to retain⁸

On the same principle it has been held by the Calcutta High Court that where a conviction by a jury is set aside on the ground of defective charge to the jury but there is evidence on record the sufficiency of which must be considered by the jury the proper course is to order a re trial by jury⁹ In the undermentioned case¹⁰ the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Sind in an appeal against an acquittal in a case tried by jury held that the High Court had jurisdiction to decide the case itself instead of ordering a new trial

25 Discharge and re trial — If both can be ordered — Where the appellate Court discharges an accused person on the ground for example of misjoinder of parties it has power to add a direction that the accused should be re tried It is not obligatory on it to leave to the discretion of the Magistrate the course which should be taken in such matter¹ It was however held in the cases noted below² that it is not ordinarily the duty of the appellate Court to order the re trial of a person whose conviction is set aside and that the prosecution may be left to take such proceedings against the accused as they may be advised to take

26 Effect of re trial on offences of which accused had been acquitted in trial Court. — Suppose A is charged with having committed offences X and Y but is convicted of offence X only and on appeal the conviction is reversed and a re trial ordered Is the whole case reopened and is A to be re tried on both charges X and Y? Yes if the facts of the case are such that the offences X and Y fall within s 236 of the Code¹ Where the accused is charged at one trial with distinct offences constituted by distinct acts and he is acquitted of one of such offences and convicted of the other an order for re trial in an appeal against the conviction will not reopen the whole case²

Where A was charged in the trial Court with offences under ss 302 and 201 of the Penal Code and was convicted under s 302, the charge under s 201 being withdrawn by the prosecution, it was held on appeal from the conviction that the appellate Court could order a re trial even in respect of the offence under s 201, since there was no acquittal on that charge³

27. Ordering re-trial for enhancing sentence. — The power of ordering a new trial merely for the purpose of enhancing the punishment ought to be very sparingly used¹ It ought not to be used at all where the trial Court was competent to inflicting the maximum punishment for the offence²

28. Remand for passing sentence or for writing proper judgment. — An appellate Court cannot remand the case to the lower Court for the purpose of passing a legal sentence, it must deal with the matter itself in accordance with law¹ Similarly, in *Tara Chand v Emperor*² it was held that an appellate Court had no power to remand a case for "re hearing the parties and writing out a proper judgment," but that it was its duty to go into the whole facts fully itself and dispose of the case In re Karupiah Pillai,³ where the trial Court had not written a judgment in conformity with the provisions of s 367, it was held that the correct procedure for the appellate Court to adopt was to accept the appeal and remand the case for re hearing de novo and not to retain the case on file, merely calling for a fresh judgment from the lower Court

29. Effect of order for re-trial in appeal — Where the Sessions Judge as an appellate Court orders a re trial in an appeal against the conviction of a first class Magistrate, the District Magistrate has no authority to disregard the same and release the prisoner¹

1882² The appellate Court cannot while ordering a commitment in any way fetter the discretion of the trial Court in the matter of procedure or evidence³

Where a Magistrate convicts the accused of an offence which is exclusively triable by a Court of Session and the appellate Court reverses the finding and orders a commitment it is not necessary that the Magistrate should commence a fresh inquiry and take evidence de novo. The enquiry and the evidence at the trial are sufficient for the purposes of commitment⁴

The words 'order him to be committed for trial' do not necessarily mean that the appellate Court cannot itself make the commitment but should direct a Magistrate to do so. Both courses are open to the appellate Court⁵

Where the appellate Court reverses the finding of the lower Court (Magistrate) on the ground that the offence is one exclusively triable by a Court of Session, the proper course to be adopted is to direct a commitment and not simply alter the charge into one for which the accused ought to have been committed and alter the sentences⁶ or try the case itself on such charge. Thus where the appellate Court reversed a conviction for an offence under s 376 on the ground that the act could not be said to be without the consent of the girl and was of opinion that the offence made out was one under s 266 (offence triable exclusively by a Court of Session) but instead of directing a commitment framed a charge under s 366 and tried the case itself it was held that it had no power to do so⁷

It is not necessary that in order that the appellate Court may direct a commitment, the offence should be one exclusively triable by a Court of Session.⁸ Where A was convicted by a Magistrate under s 326 of the Penal Code for having cut off his wife's nose and punished with imprisonment for two years, the High Court considered that the case was one which ought to have been committed, though the offence was not one exclusively triable by a Court of Session.⁹

Where a conviction was set aside on the ground that the case was one exclusively triable by a Court of Session and had been tried by the Magistrate without jurisdiction, the High Court refused to make an order for commitment in view, inter alia, of the considerable expense which the accused had been put to in the conduct of the case.¹⁰

The Appellate Court will not, while quashing the proceedings and committing the case to the Sessions Court, order that no proceedings should be taken against one of the accused merely because he has already suffered a part of the sentence, where this cannot be done without prejudicing the whole trial.¹¹

31. "Alter the finding" — The appellate Court may, under clause (b) of the section, alter the finding of the lower Court without ordering a re trial. This power, however, must be taken to be limited by the general principle that the appellate Court cannot come to any finding which the lower Court could not have legally come to, the meaning of the section must be taken to be that the appellate Court is given the power to correct any mistakes of finding which the first Court may have committed.¹ Thus, an appellate Court cannot, in a case not falling within S 237 of the Code, convict the accused of a graver offence than that charged.²

Where A is charged in the lower Court with having committed offences X and Y and is acquitted of offence X, the appellate Court may, in an appeal against the conviction for offence Y, alter the conviction to one for offence X of which A had been acquitted in the lower Court.³ The same principle will apply with greater force, where A had not been expressly acquitted or convicted of offence X, but had simply been convicted of offence Y.⁴ But it has been held in the undermentioned decisions⁵ that it is not open to the appellate Court under this clause to alter the finding to one of conviction for an offence of which the accused has been acquitted. These decisions purport to follow the decision of the Privy Council in Kishan Singh v. Emperor.⁶ But it is submitted that the Privy Council decision is purely concerned with the powers of the High Court under s 439 and does not touch the question of the powers of an appellate Court under this clause. Where A was charged with having committed offence X only, but the lower Court could, under the provisions of s 237 or s 238, have convicted the accused without a charge of offence Y also, the appellate Court can, in an appeal against the conviction for offence X, alter the conviction to one for offence Y.⁷ But can an appellate Court alter the finding in such a above stated, that an appellate Court cannot come to any finding which the trial Court could not have come to. If the appellate Court considers that the accused is guilty of another offence than that charged, it should direct a re trial with directions to alter the charge.⁹ It is conceived that it may also frame a fresh charge itself on the analogy of S 227, and proceed, after notice to the accused, to dispose of the case. This, however, should not be done if it is likely to prejudice the accused.¹⁰

In some cases, however, it has been held that the appellate Court can, where the facts are the same, alter the conviction from one under a wrong section to one under the proper section, if it does not prejudice the accused.¹¹ It has also been held in the cases cited below,¹² that the only restriction on the appellate Court's power is that the accused is not prejudiced by the alteration of the charge and that the appellate Court could alter the finding, even though the case does not fall within S 237 or S 238. It is submitted that this view cannot be supported on principle. Section 233 of the Code provides that every distinct offence must be separately charged, though where a trial does take place without a charge, it is a curable irregularity under S 535. This principle applies equally to the appellate Court as well as to the trial Court,¹³ and there is nothing to show that the appellate Court can disregard the rule any more than the trial Court. Though the words "may alter the finding" in the section are general, they must be construed in harmony with other provisions of the Code and not as overriding them.¹⁴

The word "finding" is not limited to a finding upon a point of law as distinct from a finding upon a point of fact.¹⁵

Charge for substantive offence—Conviction by appellate Court for abetment— As has been seen before, a conviction for offence X can be altered to one for offence Y if, on the facts of the case, the accused could have been convicted of offence Y without a charge by the lower Court under the provisions of Ss 237 and 239. The abetment of an offence is not a minor offence and cannot come under S 233¹⁷. But it may come under S. 237, if there is no element in it which is not included in the charge for the substantive offence. In such a case, the accused may be convicted in appeal for abetment of the offence¹⁸. See also S 236, Note 8.

32. Reduction of sentence. — Where the appellate Court rejects the appeal summarily under S 421, it cannot reduce the sentence¹. Nor can it, while affirming the conviction, reverse the sentence absolutely inasmuch as every conviction must be followed by a sentence. If it thinks the sentence severe it must pass at least a nominal sentence².

An appellate Court has power to reduce the sentence,³ but not to remit any sentence—a function which belongs to the Government⁴.

Where A and B are co accused and A alone appeals, the appellate Court can, in the ends of justice, reduce the sentence passed on B⁵.

33 “Alter the nature of the sentence, but, . . . not so as to enhance the same.” — Under the Code of 1861, the appellate Court had no power to enhance the sentence passed by the lower Court¹. Under the Code of 1872, S 280, as amended by Act 11 [XI] of 1874, the appellate Court could enhance such sentence². Under the Code of 1892 and the present Code such power does not exist³

There is a great difference of opinion as to whether particular sentences passed by the appellate Court are enhancements of the sentences passed by the first Court. Thus, the following views have been expressed :

- (1) A sentence of fine and in default X months' imprisonment is a lighter sentence than a sentence merely of X months' imprisonment⁴. A contrary view has been held in the undermentioned cases,⁵ namely that it is really an enhancement inasmuch as even if the X months' imprisonment is fully served out, the fine nevertheless continues to be leviable in other ways from the accused.
- (2) A sentence of six months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1000 and in default three months' imprisonment, in substitution of a sentence of nine months' imprisonment is not an enhancement⁶. The case will be different if the imprisonment in default added to the substantive sentence of imprisonment exceeds the original imprisonment awarded⁷.

- (3) When the sentence is altered to one of less severity than the original sentence, it is not an enhancement, even if the alteration is due to a different interpretation of the law⁸.

In the latter case, the alteration of the conviction to one of theft and maintaining the sentence is not an enhancement of the sentence. In other words, the alteration of an offence to a less grave offence, but maintaining the sentence, is not an enhancement when the act committed is held to be the same, but the alteration is due to a different interpretation of the law⁹.

- (4) Where the appellate Court passes a sentence which the lower Court has no power to pass, there is an enhancement of the sentence⁹
- (5) Where the accused, convicted of two offences, is acquitted as regards one of such offences, the maintenance of the whole punishment, awarded for the two offences, amounts to an enhancement¹⁰ The reason alleged for this view is that when a single sentence is awarded for two offences, part of it must be deemed to be for one offence and part for the other, so that the maintaining of the whole sentence for one only of the offences is an enhancement¹¹ A contrary view has been expressed in the cases below.¹²
- (6) Where a person is guilty of acts constituting a single offence, but they are split up into two or more offences and the accused is sentenced separately or given one combined sentence for the two or more supposed offences, the appellate Court is competent to alter the conviction to the proper one for the single offence and maintain the aggregate of the two sentences or the whole of the combined sentence, there is no enhancement in such a case¹³
- (7) Where a charge has several counts, the appellate Court setting aside the conviction on some of the counts, but maintaining the entire sentence, does not give any enhanced sentence¹⁴
- (8) A fine in lieu of simple imprisonment is not an enhancement.¹⁵

or incidental orders. There is a difference of opinion on the question whether in an appeal from an order under s 118, an order for further inquiry or re trial can be ordered, one view being that such further inquiry or re trial cannot be ordered⁵ and the other view being that an order for further inquiry or re trial is an "incidental order" within the meaning of cl (d) and can be passed in such cases.⁶

The word "alter" in clause (c), though literally may include an alteration increasing the severity of the penalty, cannot be so construed, the whole tenor of the section shows that the Court has no power, by alteration, to increase the severity of the penalty imposed by the trial Court.⁷

35. Subsequent events — Power to take notice of. — An appellate Court has to look to the offence as charged, and the conviction should not be disturbed because it thinks that, owing to subsequent events, the parties may have committed another offence.¹ Thus, facts which happened subsequent to the conviction or verdict cannot be utilised for the purpose of altering the verdict or of reducing the sentence.²

But where, after the verdict of the jury, it was discovered that the foreman of the jury had taken bribe, the verdict was set aside.³

36. Power to direct sentences to run concurrently. — The High Court can, under this section, and s. 561A of the Code, act under s. 397 and direct separate sentences in separate trials to run concurrently.¹

37. Appellate Court cannot canvass previous convictions. — An appellate Court cannot go into the legality of previous convictions or of orders passed against the accused.¹

38. Appellate Court, when to report to the High Court. — Where the appellate Court comes to the conclusion that the sentences in respect of the convicted persons ought to be enhanced, and therefore wishes to report to the High Court, it should do so in separate proceedings and not keep the appeal undisposed of till the report is made and orders passed thereon.¹ An appellate Court should not refer the matter of the appeal to the High Court it should decide the appeal itself²

39 "Any amendment or any consequential or incidental order" — Clause (d) — The appellate Court has under clause (d), power to make any amendment or any consequential or incidental orders that may be just and proper¹ The wide power of making amendment under the clause must however, be used with discretion so as not to prejudice the accused²

Clause (d) deals with orders to be passed after the appeal has been heard and cannot apply to matters that may arise pending appeal such as the release of the appellant on bail³ Nor can it apply to matters at the stage of admission of the appeal Thus an order cannot be passed under this clause excusing the delay in filing an appeal after limitation inasmuch as the application of this section is legitimate only after the preliminary stage indicated in Ss. 421 and 422 has been passed, i e, after the appeal is validly admitted⁴ It has however been held in the case cited below⁵ that an order dispensing with security by a person convicted under s 107 of the Code can be passed pending appeal as an incidental order under clause (d) It is submitted that this is not correct Clause (d) should be construed along with the first portion of the section which makes it clear that an order under clause (d) can be passed only after perusing the record and hearing the appeal

An amendment of charge can properly be done under this clause⁶

Whether a particular order is consequential or incidental depends on the terms of the order under consideration in each particular case and the circumstances in which it is made⁷

In *Mehi Singh v Mangal Khanda*⁸ a Full Bench of the High Court of Calcutta observed as follows

Consequential or incidental orders within the purview of the proviso must fall under one or other of the two heads

First there are orders which follow as a matter of course being the necessary complements to the main order passed without which the latter would be incomplete or ineffective Such are directions as to the refund of fines realized from acquitted appellants or, on the reversal of acquittals as to the restoration of compensation paid under section 250 and for them no separate authority is needed

Secondly there are orders which though ancillary in character require more than the support of a criminal Court's inherent jurisdiction and could not be passed without express authority

The principle in Mehi Singh's case was followed by the Allahabad High Court in the undermentioned case.⁹ The Rangoon High Court¹⁰ has however, dissented from it.

The following have all been held to be "consequential" or 'incidental' orders within the meaning of clause (d)

- (1) An order for costs under S 143, sub s (3) is incidental to an order for possession under section 145.¹¹
- (2) An order under S 517 for restoration of property to the person entitled may be passed as a consequential or incidental order.¹²
- (3) An order under S 520. See Notes on S 520.
- (4) Where a member of a Bench of Magistrates has not signed the judgment, the appellate Court can, as an incidental order, send the case back to him for such signature.¹³
- (5) An order under S 31 of the Court fees Act (now S 546A, Criminal Procedure Code) can be passed as an incidental order.¹⁴
- (6) An order under S 471 of the Code is incidental to an order of acquittal on the ground of insanity.¹⁵
- (7) An order sending a case back for re hearing can be passed under this clause.¹⁶
- (8) An order directing refund of compensation on the setting aside of an order for compensation is a consequential or incidental order within clause (d).¹⁷

Before the present Code, there was no provision corresponding to clause (d) of this section and it was held on the language of S 250, that it was the Magistrate by whom the case was heard that could pass an order under that section and not an appellate Court.¹⁸ The introduction of clause (d) would appear to make a difference. It has, however, been held that an order under S 250 is not 'consequential' or 'incidental' to an order of discharge or acquittal and cannot be passed by the appellate Court under this clause.¹⁹ See also Section 250, Note 6.

The following orders have been held not to be within clause (d) :

- (1) Order as to costs of the *appeal itself*²⁰ or of the adjournment of the appeal²¹
- (2) Order setting aside an order under S. 31 of the Court fees Act²² (now S 561A, Criminal Procedure Code)
- (3) Order reviewing the order of the predecessor.²³
- (4) Order staying criminal proceedings pending decision of civil Court.²⁴ But where an order under S. 476, sub s. (1), is set aside, proceedings under S. 476, sub s. (2), which had been begun may be stayed under clause (d).²⁵

As to whether the appellate Court can expunge the remarks occurring in the lower Court's judgment, see Section 561A, Note 7.

40. Verdict of jury — Sub-section (2). — Section 418 provides that an appeal in jury cases is limited to questions of law¹ This sub section provides that an appellate Court cannot alter or reverse the verdict of a jury unless such verdict is erroneous owing to a misdirection by the Judge or to a misunderstanding by the jury of the law as laid down by him.² This sub section should not, however, be construed as controlling S. 418 and as laying down that no question of law can be taken in appeal unless there is a misdirection by the Judge or a misunderstanding by the jury of the law as laid down by him Where the trial is illegal in fact, it may be set aside for that reason only and no question of misdirection by the Judge or misunderstanding by the jury of the law arises at all³

The admission of inadmissible evidence and the rejection of admissible evidence during the trial are questions of law. Where the Judge in his charge to the jury puts inadmissible evidence before the jury or fails to warn them against considering such evidence, there will be a misdirection which will, subject to the provisions of s 537, form a ground of interference in appeal.⁸ Where inadmissible evidence has been admitted during the trial but there has been no misdirection, it will nevertheless be an error of law and will subject to the provisions of s 537, be a ground of appeal.⁹

Where a verdict is set aside on the ground of misdirection or error of law, the appellate Court should ordinarily direct a re-trial¹⁰ though where the Court is satisfied that the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the conviction¹¹ or where the accused has been sufficiently harassed by repeated trials,¹² it may discharge or acquit the accused. can the Court go into the evidence and decide upon the facts whether, upon the merits, the decision is right and, if so, confirm the conviction notwithstanding a misdirection or an error of law?

To this question the Privy Council has, in the recent case of *Abdul Rahim v King-Emperor*¹³ given a clear answer in the affirmative, and held that a re trial need not be ordered in such cases. Previously, there was a conflict of decisions. In Wafadar Khan v. Queen Empress,¹⁴ it was held by the High Court of Calcutta that it was not open to the appellate Court to do so, the word "erroneous" according to that decision is not to be read as meaning "wrong on facts," but as meaning that the verdict had been vitiated and rendered bad or defective by reason of a misdirection or a mis understanding of the law. The appellate Court cannot determine for itself whether the verdict, as a conclusion of fact, is right or wrong, as, to hold otherwise would be to substitute the decision of the Court for the verdict of the jury. In Romesh Chandra v Emperor,¹⁵ where inadmissible evidence had been received but there was no misdirection, it was held that the misreception of evidence was likely to have adversely affected the appellant, that the verdict must be set aside on the ground of an error of law, and that a re trial only should be ordered. Referring to s 167 of the Evidence Act, which runs as follows

"The improper admission or rejection of evidence shall not be ground of itself for a new trial or reversal of any decision in any case, if it shall appear to the Court before which such objection is raised, that independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, there was sufficient evidence to justify the decision, or that, if the rejected evidence had been received, it ought not to have varied the decision,"

it was observed that the section merely says that the improper admission of evidence is not a "ground of itself" for interference, that the fact that the trial is by a jury is another factor to be taken into account, that the appellate Court cannot say on the principle of Wafadar Khan's case that there is other evidence which would justify the decision, and cannot confirm the decision unless it is satisfied that the verdict of the jury would have been the same if no evidence had been wrongly received. The High Court of Allahabad has, in Ikramuddin v Emperor,¹⁶ followed the view of the Calcutta High Court as expressed in Wafadar Khan's case, and has held that an appellate Court has no power to look at the evidence and find the accused guilty of any offence with which he was not charged in the trial Court and which was not laid before the jury. The High Court of Bombay has, on the other hand, held that, where a verdict of the jury is vitiated by a misdirection or a misreception of evidence, the appellate Court has power to convict or acquit the accused as the evidence, according to its own view, is or is not sufficient for conviction or, where the facts have to be determined and the evidence is of such a character as to render it difficult to pronounce any opinion on its character without hearing the witnesses, to order a new trial.¹⁷ A similar view has been taken by the High Courts of

Madras¹⁹ and Lahore¹⁹ and the Judicial Commissioner's Courts of Nagpur²⁰ and Sind²¹ The Calcutta High Court also held a similar view in the undermentioned decisions²² This conflict of decisions has now been set at rest by the above Privy Council decision

There is no specific provision in the Code that repugnancy in the verdict of the jury is, as in English law, by itself, a sufficient ground for quashing a conviction The powers under S 423 have, however, been held to be large enough to invoke the application of the English law rule inasmuch as it is a rule of practice based upon natural and substantial justice²³

Where a Sessions Judge, under the erroneous impression that he was bound to accept the verdict of the jury, did so and convicted and sentenced the accused, the High Court on appeal by the accused set aside the conviction and sentence alone (without touching the verdict of the jury) so that the Judge might again have an opportunity of considering if he should accept the verdict or express disagreement with it and refer the case to the High Court It was pointed out that setting aside the conviction and sentence without affecting the verdict of the jury was not prohibited under sub section (2)²⁴

1 Legislative changes — This section was first introduced in the Code of 1882, there has been no amendment to it since

Even before the enactment of this section, the High Courts had insisted on the appellate Courts writing a proper reasoned judgment when an appeal was dismissed¹

2 Scope and object of the section — The object of the section is twofold, firstly, to produce uniformity in procedure and to ensure that judgments of subordinate criminal Courts are written in such a way as to promote public confidence in their decisions and to safeguard them against the possible suggestion that cases are disposed of without proper consideration¹ and secondly to enable the High Court in revision to grasp the nature of the case without reference to the records² The High Court in criminal revision is a rule depends mainly upon the findings arrived at by the lower appellate Courts on questions of evidence. It is therefore the duty of such Courts to see that their judgments are self contained and give a full analysis of the evidence³

Where an appellate Court merely says that it has very carefully gone through the records of the case and dismisses the appeal without a discussion of the evidence or without giving reasons the assurance of the appellate Court can hardly be considered as a substitute for the judicial determination of the questions of evidence involved in the case. Such a judgment is not likely to inspire confidence in the trial of appeals in Courts below⁴

This section applies only when an appeal is admitted and heard under S 423 but not where it is summarily rejected under S 421 of the Code⁵. See also S 421 Note 7

The provisions of this section have been held to apply to appeals against orders passed under S 110⁶ S 250⁷ and S 476⁸

7 What the appellate judgment should contain — The appellate judgment should comply so far as may be practicable with the provisions of S 367¹. Thus the appellate judgment should contain among other things the point or points for determination on the decision thereon and the reasons for the decision². There is a difference of opinion on the question whether, when the appellate Court agrees with the judgment of the lower Court and dismisses an appeal it is sufficient merely to state in the appellate judgment

I have considered the evidence and I agree with the Magistrate in his conclusions and in his reasons one set of cases holding that it is sufficient³ another set of cases holding that it is not sufficient⁴ and a third set of cases holding that it may be sufficient in a simple case but not in a complicated case⁵

The true test would however appear to be really to see whether the judgment indicates that the appellate Court has really and not nominally considered the case and arrived at an independent judgment⁶ It is not necessary for the appellate Court to write reason to interfere I dismiss the appeal, has been held to be not a proper judgment.²⁹

It has been held that even where the counsel for appellant does not refer to the defence evidence the Court should consider it and give a decision.³⁰

Miscellaneous — The appellate Court should give to the accused the benefit of doubt, if, on going through the records, it has reasonable doubts about the guilt of the accused.³¹

The judgment should be temperate, sober and not satirical.³² The Court should not give inconsistent findings.³³ It is irregular to consider evidence not properly placed before the Court.³³

As to the power of the appellate Court to raise a plea of private defence on behalf of the accused when he has not himself raised the point in the lower Court, see the undermentioned case.³⁴

An appellate judgment should not impute motives to the Judge or Magistrate whose judgment is under appeal.³⁵

8 Who can pronounce judgment — There is nothing in this Code corresponding to O 20, R 2 of the Civil Procedure Code. Where, after the hearing of a criminal appeal the Judge was transferred and he subsequently wrote the judgment and forwarded the same to his successor who pronounced it, it was held that the judgment was passed without jurisdiction and should be set aside.¹

As to whether judgments can be dictated, see S 367, Note 3.

9 "Other than a High Court" — The provisions of this section apply only to subordinate Courts and not to the judgment of a High Court the High Court can undoubtedly dismiss an appeal without giving reasons.¹ There is no provision in the Code

Where certain appeals were heard by a High Court Judge and judgments were delivered in open Court and taken down by the judgment writer but the judgments were not signed owing to the death of the Judge it was held that nevertheless the appeals should be deemed to have been finally disposed of.²

10 Effect of non-observance of the provisions of this section — See S 537 Note 12

425.* (1) Whenever a case is decided on appeal by the High Court under this Chapter, it shall certify its judgment or order to the Court by which the finding, sentence or order appealed against was recorded or passed. If the finding, sentence or order was recorded or passed by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate, the certificate shall be sent through the District Magistrate.

(2) The Court to which the High Court certifies its judgment or order shall thereupon make such orders as are conformable to the judgment or order of the High Court, and, if necessary, the record shall be amended in accordance therewith.

426.† (1) Pending any appeal by a convicted person, the Appellate Court may, for reasons to be recorded by it in writing, order that the execution of the sentence or order appealed against be suspended and, also, if he is in confinement, that he be released on bail or on his own bond.

(2) The power conferred by this section on an Appellate Court may be exercised also by the High Court in the case of any appeal by a convicted person to a Court subordinate thereto.

a) (2a) When any person other than a person accused of a non bailable offence is sentenced to imprisonment by a Court, and an appeal lies from that sentence, the Court may, if the convicted person satisfies the Court that he intends to present an appeal, order that he be released on bail for a period sufficient in the opinion of the Court to enable him to present the appeal and obtain the orders of the Appellate Court under sub section (1) and the sentence of imprisonment shall, so long as he is so released on bail, be deemed to be suspended.]

b) (2b) Where a High Court is satisfied that a convicted person has been granted special leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council against any sentence which it has imposed or maintained, or has been granted leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council against an order of the Federal Court on an appeal from the High Court involving the imposition or maintenance of a sentence it may if it so thinks fit order that pending the appeal the sentence or order appealed against be suspended, and also, if the said person is in confinement, that he be released on bail.]

it had been held that it could do so under its inherent jurisdiction under S 561A. But this view was disapproved of in a decision of the Privy Council which held that the High Court had no such inherent power and that S 426 was the only section which refers to the grant of bail to a convicted person⁴. At the same time the Privy Council pointed out the desirability of conferring such a power on the High Court by legislation. Accordingly, sub-s (2 b) was inserted in this section by Act 4 (IV) of 1916, conferring on the High Court the above power.

8 Exclusion of time — Sub-section (3) — Under sub-section (3) when the appeal fails the time during which the accused is released under this section should be excluded in computing the term of which he is sentenced. But it is only when he is released and not where his sentence has been suspended that the term is to be excluded¹.

The sub-section does not mean that the period during which a person is released under this section should be excluded from the term of punishment to which he has been sentenced. What the sub-section means is that in calculating the term, the period of release should be left out of account².

427. When an appeal is presented under [section 411A, sub-section (2) or section 417,] the High Court may issue a warrant directing that the accused be arrested and brought before it or any subordinate Court, and the Court before which he is brought may commit him to prison pending the disposal of the appeal, or admit him to bail.

^a These words were substituted for the word and figures "Section 41" by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 1913 (26 [XXVI] of 1913) S 5.

1 Scope of the section — This section was added to the Code in 1882. Even before it was added it was held that the High Court had the power to re-arrest the accused pending the disposal of an appeal against his acquittal¹. This section only gives statutory effect to that power².

1. Legislative changes. — Under the Code of 1872, additional evidence could be taken only upon any point "bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the appellant"¹ These words were omitted in the Code of 1882

2. Scope and object of the section. — This section is analogous to O 41, R 27 of the Civil Procedure Code, and enables the appellate Court to take additional evidence,¹ but having regard to the difference in language between the two sections the decisions passed under the Civil Procedure Code are not a trustworthy guide in interpreting this section² In this Code itself there are other sections which empower Courts to take additional evidence See Sections 540, 375 and 439

The object of the section is to see that justice is done between the prosecutor and the person prosecuted³ The object is also "the prevention of a guilty person's escape through some careless or ignorant proceedings of a Magistrate or the vindication of a wrongfully accused person's innocence, where the same carelessness or ignorance has omitted to record circumstances essential to the elucidation of truth"⁴ In Varadarajulu v Emperor,⁵ Wallis, C J, observed

"It would not . . . be creditable to the administration of justice or in accordance with modern ideas on the subject that a conviction or a charge . . . if otherwise sustainable should be upset owing to a misconception on the part of the prosecution as to the proper mode of proving a statutory requisite [sanction of the Local Government under S 196], not affecting the merits, a misconception which was shared by the trial Magistrate"

Another reason for the enactment of this section is to save public time by taking only the additional evidence necessary instead of remanding the whole case for examining once again the witnesses already examined⁶

The additional evidence can be taken in appeals against conviction or appeals against acquittal⁷ It can be taken for the prosecution or for the defence⁸ Section 307 provides that the High Court has in proceedings under that section all the powers of an appellate Court The High Court can therefore, on a reference under S 307, call for further evidence under this section⁹

Section 439 also provides specifically that the High Court in revision may exercise the powers under this section¹⁰

See also the case cited below¹¹

3 "Appeal under this Chapter" — The powers under this section can be exercised only where firstly there is an appeal and secondly the appeal is one under this Chapter (chapter XXXI) A proceeding under S 125 of the Code is not an appellate proceeding and consequently this section does not apply¹ A proceeding under S 437 of the Code is one in revision and this section has no application to such a proceeding also² An appeal under S 476B of the Code is one under chapter XXXV and not under this Chapter and consequently this section does not apply³ It has however been held in the undermentioned cases⁴ that independently of this section the appellate Court in an appeal under S 476B has an inherent power to itself take evidence and complete an enquiry which it finds to be incomplete See also section 476D, Note 4

An appeal under S 230, sub s (3), must be considered to be one under this Chapter inasmuch as the forum of such an appeal is to be ascertained only by virtue of the provisions of this Chapter, the appellate Court may therefore record additional evidence in such cases⁵

It has been held by the Oudh Chief Court that in an appeal to the Sessions Court from the judgment of an Assistant Sessions Judge the former has no power under this section to record additional evidence or to direct such evidence to be taken and that the language of sub s (1) shows that it is only when a Sessions Court is sitting to hear an appeal from a judgment of a Magistrate that it has got such power⁶

It has been held in the undermentioned case⁷ that S 4 of Act 11 [XI] of 1846 read with R. 44 of the Rules under that Act, empowers the High Court to resort to this section in appeals against convictions by the Agent of the Mewar Estates in West Khandesh. See also the undermentioned case⁸

4. "If it thinks additional evidence to be necessary." — It has been held in the undermentioned cases,¹ that the power to take additional evidence should not be exercised for the purpose of filling a gap in the prosecution case when the necessary evidence was available to the prosecution at the hearing and ought to have been produced then. In Varadarajulu Naidu v. Emperor,² Wallis, C. J., has held that action can be taken under this section to supply a defect in formal proof but that before additional evidence is allowed the Court should be satisfied that the case is one of formal proof only. In the cases cited below,³ it has been held that it is not correct to hold that the provisions of the section are to be invoked only for supplying formal proof. In Akhtar Hussain v. Emperor,⁴ Macpherson, J., observed as follows :

"In India the onus is placed on the Court not merely to listen to the evidence, but to inquire to the utmost into the truth of the matter, and so to secure justice. Accordingly if any restriction is to be placed upon the power conferred on the appellate Court by S 428, it certainly cannot be that negligence or inadvertence on the part of the prosecution is to be allowed to effect a miscarriage of justice: on the contrary the enactment is, like the other provisions referred to, directed to the attainment of justice even at a late stage in the proceedings, by the introduction of further materials which the Court judges to be essential to a just decision of case. The conditions for the exercise of the power are set out in the section itself, and within these limits it is contemplated that the power will be exercised . . . the appellate Court is by no means condemned to countenance a miscarriage of justice because the prosecutor or even the trial Court fails to realize the necessity of bringing certain evidence on the record even if that evidence is not purely formal'

In the undermentioned Madras case⁵ it has been explained that the word 'necessary' does not import that it is impossible to pronounce judgment without the additional evidence. There may be many cases where judgment can be pronounced without any additional evidence but there are cases where it is necessary as a general measure of justice to record additional evidence.

The necessity for taking additional evidence under this section must be determined on the particular facts of each case⁶. But it has been held that the necessity for additional evidence must be apparent from the record in the case and must not be derived from external information⁷. The discretion vested in the Court of appeal should not be exercised arbitrarily⁸ but only when the interests of justice demand such a procedure⁹.

No hard and fast rule can however, be laid down. The appellate Court will not exercise the power under this section when there is no evidence at all but where there is some prima facie evidence bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, the appellate Court may act under this section¹⁰.

It has been held in the following cases that the taking of additional evidence is not an improper exercise of discretion.

(i) Where the trial Court fails to call witnesses who are known to be in a position to speak to important relevant facts but who have not been called by either party¹¹.

- (6) Where the accused is said to be insane and the medical or expert evidence has not been taken on the point.¹⁶

The Court of appeal has also under S 423, the power to remand the whole case for re trial.¹⁷ Whether a remand under that section or taking additional evidence under this section is the proper procedure will depend upon the facts of each case,¹⁸ but where an illegality in the conduct of the case has been committed, as for instance, the non compliance with the provisions of S 256 or S 312, the proper course would be to remand the case.¹⁹ An order setting aside the conviction and sending the case back for further evidence but not for complete trial is illegal.²⁰

Where in view of the allegations in the grounds of appeal as to what happened in the trial Court at the time of pronouncing judgment it became necessary to ascertain the truth of the allegations and the appellate Court summoned and examined the Magistrate of the trial Court it was held that the evidence so taken was not covered by this section but that the appellate Court had power to enquire by report or otherwise what transpired in the Magistrate's Court and that the appellate Court's procedure in making the enquiry was not wrong.²¹

5. "Shall record its reasons." — The provision was first introduced in the 1898 Code. Whenever additional evidence is now taken under this section reasons for the same should be given.¹ This provision is a guarantee against the appellate Court exercising its powers arbitrarily.²

In an appeal against the conviction of an accused for possession of cocaine, the appellate Court sent for the Chemical Examiner's report which was not tendered in evidence in the lower Court, and without any formal order admitting this further evidence and without recording the reasons for taking such additional evidence, admitted the report and ultimately dismissed the appeal. It was held that the additional evidence ought not to have been perused in appeal unless the provisions of this section were complied with.³

It has, however, been held that the mere fact that reasons have not been recorded is not an illegality vitiating the trial and that the defect is curable under S. 537 if it has not caused a failure of justice.⁴

6. "Direct it to be taken by a Magistrate." — The Court can only direct additional evidence to be taken by a Magistrate. It cannot call for a report from such Magistrate¹ or a finding on such additional evidence² and act thereon,³ nor can it send the case to the police for further investigation.⁴

A Court or Magistrate who is directed to take additional evidence can take only such evidence as has been directed or asked to be taken, and not more, whereas if the case is remanded under S. 423 the accused is entitled to lead such additional evidence as he may desire.⁵

7. "Shall certify such evidence to the Appellate Court," etc. — Sub-section (2) — The Magistrate directed to take additional evidence under this section should

8 Presence of accused while additional evidence is taken — Sub-section (3) — Under the corresponding section of the Code of 1872 the presence of the appellant could be dispensed with unless the appellate Court otherwise directed. Under the later Codes, the evidence should ordinarily be taken in the presence of the accused, though the Court has power to dispense with such presence¹. If the original trial had been with a jury or assessors it is not necessary that the additional evidence should be taken in the presence of the jury or the assessors².

9 Procedure in taking additional evidence—Sub section (4) — In taking additional evidence under this section the provisions contained in chapter XXV, 112, S 353, etc. should be followed¹.

If during the reception of the additional evidence by the Magistrate any offence against public justice as is mentioned under S 195 is committed such Magistrate is competent to prefer a complaint with reference to the same under S 476². As to the necessity of examining the accused after additional evidence is taken, see Note 9 on S 342.

10 Appeal or revision — Under S 422 of the Code of 1861 where a Court of appeal took additional evidence and disposed of the appeal the judgment was considered to be an original judgment and it was held that an appeal lay against such judgment to the High Court on the merits¹. The section was amended in 1869, and since then a judgment passed by the appellate Court after taking the additional evidence was held to be only an appellate judgment from which there was no appeal².

A Court of revision will not interfere with an order under this section made by a

One of the parties to the appeal filed a petition before the Additional District Magistrate who withdrew the appeal to his file and disposed of it without taking the additional evidence. 1. Scope and applicability of the section — This section provides for the procedure to be followed where the Judges of the Court of appeal are equally divided in opinion. This provision was first introduced in the Code of 1872. Before that year such cases were governed by the Letters Patent. Under the Letters Patent before its amendment in 1928 the opinion of the senior Judge prevailed and no reference to a third Judge was allowed¹. As regards the amendment in 1928 see Letters Patent (Calcutta), Clause 36.

The same procedure has been provided for such cases in a reference under s 378 for confirmation of death sentence. The principle of this section applies to a reference under s 307³

The powers conferred by the Code under s 195 sub s (c) (now repealed)⁴ or over applications for bail⁵ are not, however, part of the appellate and revisional jurisdiction conferred under Chapters XXXI and XXXII of the Code and consequently, where there is a difference of opinion this section does not apply but clause 86 of the Letters Patent applies.

It was held that this section did not apply to revision petitions preferred to the High Court under s 107 of the Government of India Act of 1915 as such petitions were outside the powers conferred by the Code. Such cases were governed by the Letters Patent⁶. Under s 224 of the Government of India Act of 1935 the High Court has no revisional jurisdiction over the judicial orders of subordinate Courts.

A third Judge to whom reference is made under this section cannot make a reference to a Full Bench⁷.

2 'Case'—Where upon a difference of opinion between two Judges the 'case' is laid before a third Judge, the whole case is referred to a third Judge and not merely the point or points upon which the Judges differ, it is the duty of the third Judge to consider all the points involved before he gives his opinion¹. The third Judge should not, however, differ on a point on which both the referring Judges agreed unless there are strong grounds to do so. Such cases may occur where the Judges are agreed that an accused cannot be acquitted but differ whether he ought to be convicted or whether a new trial should be ordered,² or where they are agreed that the accused is guilty but disagree on a subsidiary point e.g. a consequential order under s 517 of the Code³.

In cases, however, where there are two or more accused and the Judges are agreed in opinion with regard to one of them but are divided as regards the others the case which is laid before the third Judge is only the case of the accused with regard to whom there is a difference of opinion⁴.

3 "Judgment or order shall follow such opinion" — Where a case is referred to a third Judge, he is entitled to give his own opinion, and it will be according to such opinion that judgment will follow¹ He need not necessarily decide the case according to the opinion of the Judge who was in favour of an *acquittal*² Where the Judges are agreed as to the guilt of the accused in a murder case but differ as to whether the sentence should be one of transportation for life or of death, the High Court of Calcutta has held that the fact that there is such a difference of opinion is itself a ground for holding that the death penalty should not be awarded, though the rule is not an inflexible one and cannot be considered to prevent the third Judge to whom a reference is made under this section from considering the case for himself and to judge for himself whether death penalty should or should not be given.³

4 Appeal [Omitted]

430.* Judgments and orders passed by an Appellate Court upon appeal shall be final, except in the cases provided for in section 417 and Chapter XXXII.

Finality of orders
on appeal

1 Scope of the section. — Sections 407 to 415A, provide for appeals against convictions, and s 417 for appeals against acquittals, in trials. An appeal is to all intents and purposes, a trial¹ Therefore, in the absence of a specific provision to the contrary, it would be open to contend that a conviction by an appellate Court is also open to appeal under the said provisions. This section is intended to negative such a result and provides that an appellate judgment or order is final,² subject to the provisions of s 417 and Chapter XXXII (revision). A sentence is said to be final when it cannot be set aside or interfered with in any manner by any Court³

This section does not, in any way, affect the provisions of s 360, which, by force of s 424, is applicable to judgments in appeals also

Reading the two sections together, as they ought to be, it follows that an appellate Court, like the trial Court, cannot alter or review its own judgment or order. Nor is such judgment or order open to any further appeal except as provided by s 417

The question has arisen as to whether a judgment given in an appeal without hearing the appellant or his pleader is a bar to the Court reconsidering the matter subsequently either by directly reviewing its previous decision or by way of entertaining a fresh appeal or application for the same purpose. The answer to the question depends largely upon a consideration of the provisions of ss 421 and 423. Section 421 lays down the conditions, on the fulfilment of which an appellate Court is entitled to dismiss an appeal summarily. These conditions vary with two classes of appeals, which may, for the sake of convenience of expression, be called jail appeals, that is, appeals which are presented through the officer in charge of the jail and non-jail appeals which would include all other appeals.

As regards jail appeal, S 421 requires the Court to peruse the petition of appeal and the copy of the judgment under appeal before dismissing it. If this is done, the judgment of dismissal is final and cannot, under the provisions of S 369, be altered or reviewed by the same Court, as for example, by entertaining a fresh appeal or application in respect of the same matter,⁴ even though the appellant was actually not heard in the matter.⁵ The reason is that in jail appeals this section does not make it essential that the appellant should be heard before the appeal is dismissed.⁶ On the other hand, where the Court dismisses a jail appeal without perusing the petition of appeal or the copy of the judgment accompanying it, it will be acting without jurisdiction and the dismissal is not a valid judgment or order which is entitled to that finality which is conferred on judgments by S 369, a subsequent appeal or application in respect of the same matter is open to consideration on its merits.⁷

As regards non jail appeals, S 421 imposes an additional duty on the appellate Court, besides that of a perusal of the petition of appeal and of the copy of the judgment appealed against, and that is, that the appellant or his pleader should have had a reasonable opportunity of being heard in support of the appeal, before it is dismissed summarily. Where these conditions are satisfied and the appeal is dismissed, the dismissal is final and cannot be reconsidered in any manner such as the entertainment of a fresh appeal or application for the same purpose,⁸ even though the appellant or his pleader was absent at the hearing and was consequently not heard.⁹ But where no such opportunity has been given the dismissal of the appeal would be without jurisdiction and will not bar a reconsideration of the matter.¹⁰

Where an appeal is not summarily dismissed under S 421, the Court is bound to give notice to the parties under S 422, send for the records of the case from the lower Court, peruse the same, and hear the parties if they appear, before making a final order in the appeal. If these conditions are fulfilled the judgment or order of the appellate Court is not open to reconsideration by the same Court and is final. The fact that the parties or their pleaders were not present notwithstanding the opportunity given to them, and were consequently not heard, does not affect the finality of the appellate judgment or order.¹¹ But where the conditions of Ss 422 and 423 are not fulfilled, as where an appeal is dismissed merely for default of appearance of the parties,¹² or when no notice has been given to the parties as to the date and place of hearing,¹³ or the parties though present are not heard, the judgment will be without jurisdiction and will not be a bar to a subsequent reconsideration of the same matter.

Where a convicted person has preferred both a jail appeal and an appeal through a pleader and both of them are pending and the Court dismisses the former summarily in ignorance of the latter appeal, still, it cannot set aside the order of dismissal,¹⁴ but the High Court in revision can set aside such order.¹⁵

It has been held by the High Courts of Madras and Bombay that the dismissal of an appeal under S 421 on the ground that the appeal is barred by limitation is a valid judgment and is final¹⁶ A contrary view has however, been expressed in the under mentioned case¹⁷ It is submitted that the latter view is incorrect

A was charged with offences under Ss 302 and 304 of the Penal Code At the trial, he was acquitted of the offence under S 302 and was convicted of the offence under S 304 A's appeal against his conviction under S 304 was dismissed by the High Court Then the Provincial Government appealed against A's acquittal of the offence under S 302 It was held that the order of the High Court passed in A's appeal from his conviction under S 304 did not preclude the High Court from hearing the appeal against his acquittal.¹⁸ See also the undermentioned decision¹⁹

2 Temporary dismissal of appeal — The temporary dismissal of an appeal is a procedure unknown to the law An appellate Court cannot, therefore, dismiss an appeal till the decision of a civil suit between the parties¹ The appellate Court can, however, postpone the decision of an appeal in suitable cases.²

3 Effect of dismissal of appeal on application under section 439 for enhancement of sentence — See Notes on Section 439

431. Every appeal under [section 411A, sub-section (2) or Abatement of appeals section 417] shall finally abate on the death of the accused, and every other appeal under this Chapter (except an appeal from a sentence of fine) shall finally abate on the death of the appellant

a These words and figures were substituted for the word and figures Section 417 by the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act 1943 (26 [XXVI] of 1943) S 5

1. Scope and applicability of the section — This section deals with the question of abatement of appeals An appeal under S 417 or S 411A (2) abates on the death of the accused Every other appeal except an appeal from a sentence of fine abates on the death of the appellant The exception as to an appeal against a sentence of fine was introduced in the Code of 1898 it having been held under the old Code that in such cases the appeal abated and that the only remedy of the legal representative was to apply to the Government¹ The object of introducing the exception was to prevent the estate of the deceased appellant

Thus he can refer questions of law arising in respect of proceedings under the Police Act¹ the Extradition Act² the Stamp Act³ the Bombay Abkari Act⁴ the Bombay Municipal Act⁵ the Calcutta Municipal Act⁶ the Madras City Municipal Act⁷ etc.

2 Reference by Presidency Magistrate — This section empowers only a Presidency Magistrate to make a reference to the High Court. A Sessions Judge or a District Magistrate has no power to make a reference except as provided by S 433¹ and no other Magistrate trying the case has any power at all to make any reference to the High Court.²

The High Court has no jurisdiction to direct a Magistrate to state a case under this section, if in his discretion he does not desire to do so, and in any case the High Court will not direct him to state a case after he has recorded an order of acquittal.³

3. "Any question of law."—A reference can be made under this section only on questions of law, that is, questions relating to procedure, jurisdiction, construction and interpretation of the provisions of law, etc.¹ There is no power to refer any question of fact² and even if any opinion is expressed by the High Court in respect of any such question of fact, it will not have the force of a ruling.³ The Magistrate cannot also refer questions of law if such questions have already been settled by judicial precedents binding on him even though he may doubt the soundness or correctness of such precedents.⁴ He should state the question on which he requires the opinion of the High Court distinctly and in the form of a definite question of law,⁵ it is not necessary for him to set out the entire facts in the order of reference.

3a "May give judgment . . . on such reference."—Under the first part of this section, the Presidency Magistrate has power to make a reference to the High Court in the form of a definite question of law without setting out the facts of the case. But, at times it may be undesirable to make the reference in the form which involves giving a decision on law divorced from the facts. It is therefore, desirable in such cases to use the second part of this section—that is to say, the Magistrate should give the judgment in the case subject to the decision of the High Court on the reference. By adopting this course duplicity of hearing in both Courts would probably be avoided and all the facts would be before the High Court once for all.¹

4. "Arises in the hearing of any case"—The Magistrate cannot refer any question of law if the accused has just been placed before him and the hearing of the case

433.* (1) When a question has been so referred, the High Court shall pass such order thereon as it thinks fit, and shall dispose of case according to decision of High Court shall cause a copy of such order to be sent to the Magistrate by whom the reference was made, who shall dispose of the case conformably to the said order.

(2) The High Court may direct by whom the costs of such reference shall be paid

1. Scope of the section — The High Court is strictly confined to the terms of the reference made by the Presidency Magistrate under S 432, it has no power to deal with facts or to consider any other contentions that may have been raised in the case before the Magistrate¹ Where the High Court passes an order under this section and the Magistrate gives a decision in conformity with such order, it has no power to reconsider or review that order in case the matter comes up before it in appeal²

The decision of the High Court on a reference under S 432 is an opinion and not a "judgment decree or order" within the meaning of section 205 (1) of the Government of India Act of 1935³

(2) If the Judge reserves any such question, the person convicted shall, pending the decision thereon be remanded to jail, or, if the Judge thinks fit, be admitted to bail, and the High Court shall have power to review the case, or such part of it as may be necessary, and finally determine such question, and thereupon to alter the sentence passed by the Court of original jurisdiction, and to pass such judgment or order as the High Court thinks fit

1 Scope of the section — This section empowers the Courts specified therein to call for the records of inferior criminal Courts and examine them for the purpose of satisfying themselves as to whether a sentence, finding or order of such inferior Court is legal, correct or proper, or whether the proceedings of such inferior Courts are regular¹ A High Court has, in addition to the power under this section an inherent power to make such orders as are necessary for the ends of justice (S 561A)² Under S 107 of the Government of India Act (1915), a chartered High Court had, independently of this section, also power to revise orders of inferior Courts under its powers of superintendence³ But under sub s (2) of S 224 of the Government of India Act, 1935, a High Court has no such power⁴

The object of conferring powers of revision under this section is to give superior criminal Courts a supervisory jurisdiction in order to correct miscarriage of justice arising from misconception of law, irregularity of procedure, neglect of proper precautions or apparent harshness of treatment which has resulted on the one hand in some injury to the due maintenance of law and order, or on the other hand, in some undeserved hardship to individuals⁵ The aim of the Legislature is, however, to secure the setting right of a patent

(3) such Court must be situate within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the revision Court see Note 9, and

(4) the purpose for which the records are called for should be one to enable the revision Court to satisfy itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding sentence or order recorded or passed and as to the regularity of any proceedings of such inferior Court

The High Court's right to have matters brought to its notice and to examine the record for itself is as much a part of the administration of justice as its duty to hear appeals and revisions and interlocutory applications. Hence where a revision petition by a prisoner addressed to the High Court is handed over to the Jail Superintendent and the latter deliberately withholds it from the High Court and declines to forward it the Jail Superintendent interferes with the administration of justice and is guilty of a criminal contempt⁷

The records of a proceeding can be called for under this section even when the proceeding is pending before the inferior criminal Court⁸

2 What Courts can revise proceedings under this section — The power to call for the records of an inferior criminal Court can be exercised only by the Courts specified in the section namely —

(1) the High Court

(2) the Sessions Judge

(3) the District Magistrate, or

(4) the Sub divisional Magistrate empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf

An Additional Sessions Judge cannot exercise the powers of a Sessions Judge and act under this section¹ except in cases which may be transferred to him by or under any general or special order of the Sessions Judge² (See s 438 sub s (2) and Note 12 thereon) A special Judge cannot exercise the powers of a Sessions Judge and act under this section³ Similarly, a joint Magistrate cannot exercise the powers of a District Magistrate and act under this section⁴ So also an order signed by another person for the District Magistrate calling for a proceeding is an order without authority⁵

The application referred to in sub s (4) of the section is an application by a party to the proceeding, e g, the accused, the Crown or the complainant³ An application by third person will be treated as supplying information to the Court on which it may act. The Court will, however act on such information only if there are a priori grounds for apprehending that a miscarriage of justice has taken place⁵ Thus, where a person convicted refused to take part in the proceedings but a member of the bar applied for revision of the proceedings, the High Court refused to call for the record, on the ground that there was nothing to show that there was any miscarriage of justice, and further observed that the Court should be loath to interfere on behalf of a person convicted in a criminal case if that person is an adult and of ordinary intelligence when that person himself in no way contests the propriety of his conviction.⁶ Where the Bar Association applied for revision against the conviction of certain members of the Bar who refused to take any part in the proceedings the Chief Court of Oudh interfered in revision observing that the Bar Association was right in making the application⁷ See also Note 9 on Section 439

7 (30) 17 AIR 1930 Oadh 497 (494), 32 Cri L Jour 104. Mohandlal Salve v. Emperor

In the undermentioned case⁸ it was held that the procedure of a Magistrate applying to the District Magistrate for advice in regard to a question of jurisdiction in a case pending before him was erroneous and that he ought to have completed the inquiry himself and passed such order as to him seemed legal and proper

Applicants in revision to High Court must be prepared with their cases and with the documents in support. The High Court will not send for the record unless there is sufficient material to justify that course and will not adjourn the case merely to enable a party to do what he should have done before prosecuting the application⁹

5 High Court will not entertain application unless the lower Court has first been approached — The Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate have concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court to call for the record of inferior criminal Courts under this section. The practice is however firmly established that the High Court will not entertain an application for revision where the applicant could have applied to the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate and has not done so¹. is firstly, to prevent the time of the High Court from being wasted and secondly, to have the advantage of the opinion of the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate in case the matter should eventually come before the High Court³. The object of the practice is not attained by the mere fact that an appeal was preferred to the District Magistrate⁴. The practice does not however oust the jurisdiction of the High Court to entertain a revision in contravention of the practice⁵ and the discretion of the High Court is not fettered by any hard and fast rule⁶. Thus in a special case as when an application is presented by a third party in the interests of the public or when the appeal from the Court whose order is challenged lies directly to the High Court the High Court can entertain an application in revision even though no such application was made to the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate⁶. civil Court taking proceedings against a suitor for contempt is not a criminal Court²⁰ It has, however, been held in the undermentioned cases²¹ that, when exercising jurisdiction under the Criminal Procedure Code, even the civil or revenue Court must for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be a criminal Court. It is submitted that this view is not correct. As has been seen already, a criminal Court must be constituted as such, either under the Criminal Procedure Code or under some other law for the time being in force. The test is not the nature of the proceeding before the Court at a given time, but the nature of the Court by which that proceeding is held²². In the undermentioned case²³ a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court, without holding that a civil Court taking proceedings of a criminal nature is a criminal Court, held that such proceedings are subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court under s 439. The decision proceeds on the ground that s 439 is wider than s 435 and though the latter section applies only to criminal Courts, s 439 applies to any proceeding of a criminal nature although the Court before which such proceeding may take place is not a criminal Court.

See also S 195 Note 28 and S 476B, Note 13

8 The Court whose proceedings are revised must be an inferior Criminal Court — Explanation — Under the Code of 1861 the High Court could call for the record of the criminal proceedings of any Court within its jurisdiction (S 401), while the Court of Session and the District Magistrate could call for the record only of a Court immediately subordinate to such Court or Magistrate (S 484). It was held that a subordinate Magistrate was not immediately subordinate to the Sessions Judge and that the latter could not call for the records of the proceedings held by the former¹ It was also held that the words 'immediately subordinate' did not refer to the judicial powers of the Magistrate and that all Magistrates in the district were immediately subordinate to the District Magistrate²

Under the Code of 1872 the High Court as well as the Court of Session or the District Magistrate could call for the records of the proceedings of all Courts subordinate to such Court or Magistrate. It was held in the undermentioned case³ that a committing Magistrate was 'subordinate' to the Court of Session.

The word inferior was substituted in the Code of 1882 for the word 'subordinate'. The former is wider than the latter. Being 'subordinate' is necessarily being inferior. A Court statutorily incompetent to hold or exercise equal powers with another is also 'inferior' to the latter even though it is not "subordinate" to it. There may be inferiority without subordination but there cannot be subordination without inferiority⁴. Thus a District Magistrate is 'inferior' to the Court of Session, though not subordinate to it⁵. A first class Magistrate is necessarily inferior to the District Magistrate inasmuch as under s 17 of the Code he is subordinate to the District Magistrate⁶. A Full Bench of the High Court of Patna has held that as a Special Magistrate under Ordinance 2 [II] of 1942 derives his jurisdiction from the Ordinance he cannot be properly described as an inferior criminal Court and the High Court cannot revise his order⁷. An Additional District Magistrate though not subordinate to the District Magistrate except for certain special purposes is nevertheless inferior to the latter for the purposes of this section⁸.

A single Judge of the High Court is not inferior to the High Court and the proceedings of the former are not open to revision under this section⁹. A Court cannot sit in revision upon its own record¹⁰ A Magistrate, other than a District Magistrate specially empowered under s 70, is "inferior" to the District Magistrate¹¹ A Sub divisional Magistrate holding inquiry under s 176 of the Code is a Court inferior to the High Court¹²

Where an appeal under s 47CB preferred before a District and Sessions Judge against the order of a Subordinate Judge was referred by the District Judge to the Assistant Judge, it was doubted by the Bombay High Court whether the Sessions Judge had power under this section to call for the record before the Assistant Judge, inasmuch as the latter was exercising a jurisdiction concurrent with that of the Sessions Judge under s 17 of the Bombay Civil Courts Act of 1862¹³

9. Such inferior Court must be within the local limits of the revising Court's jurisdiction. — The word "situate" means "fixed or located" When applied to a Court, it must be taken to refer to the place where the Court ordinarily sits¹

The dominions of the Sultan of Muscat are not within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Bombay and the latter has no criminal revisional jurisdiction over the proceedings of His Majesty's Consul within such dominions² Similarly, Mohurbunj is a place outside British India and the High Court cannot revise proceedings taken by the Superintendent of the Tributary Mahals for offences committed in Mohurbunj³

The special tribunal created by the Defence of India Act is not subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court and its proceedings cannot be revised by the High Court⁴

See also the undermentioned case⁵

10. "Any proceeding" may be called for. — Under the Codes of 1861 and 1872, the revisional powers of the High Court were confined to judicial proceedings¹ A proceeding, therefore, which was not judicial was held not to be open to revision under

The Code of 1882 did not enact any provision corresponding to s 520 of the older Code, but added a paragraph in s 435 to the effect that orders made under ss 143 and 144 and proceedings under s 176 were not proceedings within the meaning of s 435. 12. Correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order and regularity of any proceeding. — The power of revision extends to considering not only the legality of the orders passed, but also the correctness or propriety of the proceeding or of the orders passed¹ For this purpose the Court of revision has jurisdiction to go into questions of fact and see whether the order or proceeding, though not wrong in law, is proper or correct. See Notes 15 and 16 on S 430.

The words 'finding, sentence or order' are three separate matters on which a revision may be heard. Thus, it is perfectly legal for the Judge to order under S 440 that the counsel should not be heard on the question of finding but that there should be hearing only on the question of sentence² As to the meaning of the words 'finding,' 'sentence' 'order' and 'proceeding' as used in this section see the undermentioned case³

In a pending case no question as to the correctness or propriety of a finding can arise, consequently the superior Court can examine the proceedings of the inferior Court only to satisfy itself as to their regularity⁴

An order by a Magistrate refusing an application to "recommend to the District Magistrate that the prosecution should be withdrawn is the only order that can be passed on such an application and there can be no ground for revising such order even if it were revisable⁵

13. Extent of power of Sessions Judge or District Magistrate. — Where a Sessions Judge or a District Magistrate calls for and examines the record of proceeding of an inferior Court, and finds that any finding, sentence or order is not correct, legal or proper, or that the proceedings are irregular he can (except in cases covered by ss 436 and 437 and the portion of sub s (1) of this section) only refer the matter to the High Court under S 438¹ He has no authority to hear the case as one judicially before him and send word 'sentence' means a direction by which a punishment is prescribed and meted out to a person who has been convicted of an offence. Order covers commands or directions that something shall be done, discontinued or suffered, but it does not include sentence and finding. The word proceedings is wider than the expression judicial proceedings and covers everything done and recorded by an inferior or municipal Court acting as a Court. But it means everything of this kind which is not a finding, sentence or order. The words 'finding, sentence' 'order and proceedings' cover everything which may be remedied in revision.)

The Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate have concurrent jurisdiction under this section and consequently, where an application is made under the section to the Sessions Judge he cannot endorse the same to the District Magistrate for action but must deal with it himself⁷.

It may also be noted in this connexion that where a subordinate Magistrate is properly seised of a case, a superior Magistrate or the Sessions Judge cannot except under this section or by withdrawal of such case, take any action in regard to such proceeding⁸.

13a Extent of power of Sub-divisional Magistrate—Sub-section (2) —

Under sub s. (2) a Sub divisional Magistrate acting under this section has power only to forward the record to the District Magistrate with such remark thereon as he thinks fit. He has no power to set aside the order¹

As to the power of Sub divisional Magistrate to make reference in cases submitted to him under S 380, see Note 3A on that section 14 Revision not to be entertained by both the Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate — Sub-section (4) — There was a conflict of opinion under the old Code as to whether the entertaining of an application for revision by the District Magistrate or the Sessions Judge barred the other of them from entertaining a fresh application for revision¹. Sub section (4) was newly inserted in 1898 in order to settle this conflict of opinion, and it is now clear that when an application has been made to either the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate, it cannot again be entertained by the other of them². It does not make any difference that the application made to the latter is by a party other than the one who made an application to the former: the sub section must be construed as meaning that where either the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate has had an application in revision in the same matter moved by either party the other Court would have no jurisdiction to hear a further application in the same matter even though made by another party³. The words further application in this sub section mean any other application in respect of the order in question passed by the inferior Court⁴.

The intention of the Legislature in enacting this sub-section is to avoid a conflict of opinion between Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction⁵ and to prevent them from simultaneously exercising their powers of revision in such a way as would amount, as it were, to hearing an appeal by one of them from, or reviewing an order passed by the other of them⁶.

Although this sub section speaks of entertaining an application the principle on which it is based will equally apply to action taken suo motu. Thus where a revision has been entertained by a District Magistrate the Sessions Judge cannot suo motu again revise the proceedings⁷. Where the District Magistrate ordered a further enquiry on revision it was held that the Sessions Judge could not make a reference under S 438 of the Code against the order of the inferior Court⁸.

But the word "made" used in the subsection means not only made but also "entertained and decided" Consequently, where an application made to a District Magistrate was not entertained by him, a fresh application to the Sessions Judge is not barred by this subsection⁹ Similarly, where an application made to the Sessions Judge is withdrawn and is rejected for want of prosecution, a fresh application to the District Magistrate is not barred¹⁰

15 Bar of revision — A revision always lies unless the jurisdiction to revise is taken away by express words or by necessary implication¹ Thus, s 22 of the Press Act, 1910, s 15 of the Extradition Act, 1903, s 16 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1897,² expressly take away the revisional powers of the Court in regard to the orders respectively specified therein Under subs (3) of this section as it stood before 1923, the right of revision in respect of orders under ss 143, 144 and proceedings under Chapter XII and s 176, was expressly taken away In the undermentioned case,³ the right of revision in respect of an order under s 396 of the Code, as it stood before 1923, was held to be impliedly barred by that section See also the undermentioned cases⁴

But even in respect of such orders, a revision will lie, if the order is not authorized by the provision under which it is purported to be passed The reason is that in such cases the order⁵ of the Court under that provision is without jurisdiction, and it must be assumed that the action was taken under the Court's general jurisdiction, in which case it is open to revision⁶ On this principle orders under chapter XII of the Code and under s 176 were frequently interfered with in revision See Note 11 But a Full Bench of the High Court of Allahabad held, with reference to s 26 of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance 2 [II] of 1912, (since repealed) that even if a Special Judge did not conform strictly to the 16 Revision of proceedings of village officers — A village Magistrate in Madras and police patels in Bombay have been constituted criminal Courts in respect of certain matters, by Madras Regulations 11 (XII) of 1816 and 4 (IV) of 1821 and by the Bombay Village Police Act, respectively. By S 1, however the provisions of the Code do not apply to them and consequently it was held that the High Court could not revise their proceedings under the Code, though it could do so under their powers of superintendence under S 15 of the Charter Act (Government of India Act 1915 S 107).¹ But under S 221 of the Government of India Act 1935 the High Court's revisional powers over judicial orders of Subordinate Courts have been taken away.

17 Order under the Code for execution of extradition warrant — Revision, if barred. — It has been held by the High Courts of Allahabad and Calcutta that when a Magistrate orders the arrest of an accused person on an extradition warrant under S 7 of the Extradition Act (15 [XV] of 1903), he is only acting in his executive capacity and not as a Court and that therefore, the order cannot be interfered with in revision.¹ A contrary view, namely, that the order is a judicial one and therefore, could be interfered with in revision, has been held by the High Court of Bombay.² It has also been held by the latter High Court³ and by the High Court of Patna⁴ that S 15 of the Extradition Act only ousts the jurisdiction of the High Court to enquire into the propriety of warrant issued under S 7, but leaves open the High Court's power to interfere with the Magistrate's action if it was proved that such action was consequent upon a warrant which was plainly illegal. 18 Limitation for application for revision — See S 439, Note 42

19. Second application for revision — A fresh application for revision on the same grounds as those on which a previous application was based is not maintainable¹. The reason is threefold firstly, it is a universal principle of law in the absence of direct statutory provision that when a matter has been finally disposed of by a Court the Court is functus officio and cannot entertain a fresh prayer for the same relief unless and until the previous order of final disposal has been set aside,² secondly, the subsequent revision if treated as a review of the previous order, is barred by the provisions of S 369,³ and thirdly, one Judge of the High Court is not a criminal Court inferior to the High Court. See Note 8. The principle will apply to all points which the party ought to have raised in the previous application⁴. Thus, where A makes an application in revision and deliberately keeps back one point, he will not, by a second application, be allowed to raise the point omitted, though it may be otherwise if a real point has been omitted by some bona fide mistake for which he is not responsible⁵.

Suppose now that the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate revises the proceedings of an inferior Court suo motu, or the High Court revises proceedings on a reference by the Sessions Judge. Can an application for revision be subsequently entertained on the same grounds as those which formed the subject matter of the previous revision? There is a conflict of opinion on the point. In Nga Than v Emperor,⁶ a District Magistrate who had dealt with a case in revision suo motu and decided that there was no cause for interfering with an order of discharge of the accused, entertained an application by the complainant for revision of the same order and passed an order for further enquiry under s 477. It was held that the subsequent application must be regarded as one for reviewing the previous order in revision and was therefore barred by the provisions of s 369 of the Code. In *Mo Tun Myung v Ngai Kank Sin*⁷ a contrary view was taken it was held that though a mere perusal of the record suo motu might not have disclosed sufficient cause for interference the Sessions Judge was not precluded from hearing the application where it alleged specific reasons for interfering. In Sripit Narain Singh v Gahbar Rai,⁸ where the High Court had refused to interfere on a reference by the Sessions Judge under s 477 and a subsequent application for revision was filed by the accused, it was held by the High Court of Allahabad that the application must be treated as an application for review of the previous order and that there being no flaw in the previous order, the application must be rejected.

A second application for revision will, however, be barred only when the particular point raised in it was the subject matter for decision in the prior revision application. An application by an accused person for revision against his conviction does not bar an application by the complainant for enhancement of the sentence.⁹

20. Dismissal for default — Restoration. — There is a difference of opinion on the question whether an application for revision dismissed for default can be restored to file and heard. In the undermentioned case¹ the High Court of Calcutta restored such an application to file. The High Court of Madras has expressed conflicting views. In *Ranga Rao v Emperor*² it has held that in cases of criminal revision no distinction can be made between an order passed without hearing the petitioner and one in which he is heard and that in view of s 369 a petition dismissed for default cannot be restored. In *Kunhamad Haji v Emperor*³ it was held that where a revision application is dismissed for default there is no judgment at all and there is no bar against rehearing the matter. According to the High Courts of Calcutta⁴ and Rangoon,⁵ a 'judgment' means a judgment on the merits and a dismissal for default not being one on the merits does not bar re-consideration of the matter. See also s 369, note 5.

21. Duty of Court whose records are called for. — As a general rule no Court is at liberty to part with its judicial records except when called for by an appellate Court or on demand by a superior Court under this section.¹

The calling for the record under this section suspends the jurisdiction of the inferior Court to continue the proceedings,² or to pass ad interim orders in such

It is desirable that Courts should not place difficulties in the way of persons entitled to appeal, by calling for proceedings and taking action upon them within the period allowed for appeal⁷

Overlooking of Precedents leads to Erroneous Decisions.

(1943) 30 A I R 1943 Privy Council 189 (191) — In an appeal from Allahabad the question for decision involved was as to the inherent power of the Court to grant restitution to the successful defendant. Their Lordships observed: "The decision of the Board in 40 I A 223 was not cited in either of the Courts in India. The application now before the Board invoked the powers of the learned Subordinate Judge to assess the sum due by way of restitution by the method laid down in 40 I A 223. For this purpose the case must go back to the Court of the Subordinate Judge."

of O 34, Civil P C

The difficulty which had arisen as to these words in several cases, e.g., Vanmika linga v Chidambara, (1905) 1 L R 29 Mad 87 — which case it may be mentioned, does not seem to have been brought to the notice of the Board in Het Ram's case, (1918) 45 I A 130—therefore no longer arises.

(1945) 32 A I R 1945 Calcutta 312 (315) — The decision of the Judicial Committee on appeal reported in (1939) 66 I A 104 was not cited at the Bar at least it was not noticed in the judgment (i.e., in I L R (1943) 1 Cal 69). We dissent from the judgment in I L R (1943) 1 Cal 69.

(1945) 32 A I R 1945 Lahore 260 (261) (FB) — Per Achhru Ram J. (in the Order of Reference) — He (i.e. Patanjali Sastri J in A I R 1942 Mad 13) does not however appear to have noticed one of the Division Bench judgments of his own Court reported in A I R 1920 Mad 177 which also dealt with the same subject and took just the opposite view from that taken by him.

(1945) 32 A I R 1945 Madras 139 (141) (FB) — The decisions in which the contrary view has been expressed are 45 Mad 466 A I R 1919 Mad 290 A I R 1923 Mad 440 and 1911 2 M L J. 754. In the first of these cases the Court did not however consider the case in 5 Mad 141. In none of the other cases was any reason given for the view expressed and in no case was 5 Mad 141 mentioned or considered. We consider that 5 Mad 141 should be followed.

(1944) 31 A I R 1944 Bombay 100 (103) = I L R 1944 Bom 12 — Per Sen J — This case (viz 41 Bom L R 521) was decided in 1938 and it is to be observed that the earlier decision in 36 Bom L R 1201 was not cited before the Court nor was it noticed in the judgment.

(1944) 31 A I R 1944 Lahore 329 (335) (FB) — Per Din Mohammad J — The only Lahore authority which has been brought to our notice in support of this view is one reported as A I R 1938 Lah 886. The learned Judges (in that case) referred to no previous case of this Court (namely (1937) 18 Lah. 268) but mentioned the case in 51 Cal 969 in support of their decision without trying to analyse its dictum.

(1944) 31 A I R 1944 Madras 421 (422) — There was however one decision to which our attention was drawn the decision of Venkataramana Rao J reported in 1939 M W N 1009. It does not appear that the decision of Venkatasubba Rao and Cornish JJ in (1936) 59 Mad 751 was brought to the notice of the learned Judge especially the observations of Cornish J and we do not think that that case can be held to be an authority apart from the special facts on which it was decided.

(1944) 31 A I R 1944 Patna 17 (21) = 22 Pat 783 (FB) — While considering the decision in A I R 1923 Cal 362 Sinha J observed — "Though the decision related to the question of court fees payable on the plaint their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court do not appear to have considered the previous decision of that very Court in the matter of court fees which will be referred to presently. The case referred to is 29 Cal 704."

(1943) 30 A I R 1943 Allahabad 220 (230) = I L R 1943 All 610 (FB) — Per Mathur J — The same view was taken by a Division Bench of this Court in (1929) 51 ALL. 500. The case was decided by Sulaman and Kendall JJ. This case was decided before the Full Bench case in 1931 A. L. J. 64 but has not been referred to in the judgment of the Full Bench "

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Allahabad 393 (397) = I. L. R. 1944 All. 76 (FB) — Per Collister, J. — "The next decision to which I will refer is A I R. 1929 ALL 209. . . The Full Bench decision in (1920) 42 ALL 575 was not referred to by the learned Judge . . ."

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Bom. 409 (411) = I. L. R. 1943 Bom 525. — Per Beaumont, C J — "In a later case a Bench of this Court in 41 Bom L R. 1269 held that the direction for payment of costs in (O 83) R. 15 can be waived by the defendant Unfortunately, 34 Bom L R 236 was not brought to the notice of the Court in 41 Bom. L R 1269 "

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Lahore 65 (72) (FB) = I. L. R. 1943 Lah. 257. — Per Bhude, J. — "It is, however, clear from the decision in (1925) 7 Lah L J 448 that the learned Chief Justice did not intend to lay down that such a branch of the suit, at any rate, should not be looked upon as a 'case' for the purpose of S. 115, Civil P C. The Full Bench decision in (1924) 5 Lah 258 was not referred to in 7 Lah L J. 448 "

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Madras 633 (636). — Per Somayya, J. — "There is also a prior decision of this Court to the same effect in (1912) 17 I C 593 The decision in 17 I C 593 was not apparently brought to the notice of the learned Judges in (1915) 39 Mad 62 "

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Patna 305 (308, 310) = 22 Pat. 187. — Per Chatterji, J. — "In support of this contention he relies on the decision of the Allahabad High Court in I L R (1939) ALL 185 in which the view was expressed that . . . This view is directly opposed to the decision of the Privy Council in (1905) 32 I A 123 It is to be observed that this decision of the Privy Council was not noticed in the Allahabad case."

"In the case of (1922) 1 Pat 780 the facts were these . . . Their Lordships based their decision on the Privy Council case in (1910) 39 I A 68 Das J who delivered the judgment said The Privy Council case in (1905) 32 I A 123, cited above, which to my mind furnishes a clue to the solution of the problem before us, was not referred to in the judgment of Das J That being so, I do not think it necessary to refer the matter to a Full Bench."

(1943) 30 A. I. R. 1943 Patna 96 (101) = 21 Pat 799. — Per Chatterji, J. — "I may observe here that in 52 ALL 1005, which was decided in May 1930, there is no reference to 17 Cal 548 (F.B.), decided in 1900, or to 55 Cal 1181, decided and reported in 1928 "

(1942) 29 A. I. R. 1942 Lahore 228 (230) (FB) = I L R. 1943 Lah. 1. — Per Tek Chand, J. — "This decision is not in accord with 12 P R. 1911, in which the identical objection had been raised and overruled That case was regarded in the Chief Court and this Court as the ruling authority on the subject for over 25 years, but there is no reference to it in the judgment in A I R. 1937 Lah 637 Apparently, the attention of the learned Judge, who decided the latter case, was not drawn to it "

(1941) 28 A. I. R. 1941 Madras 933 (933, 934) = I. L. R. 1942 Mad. 264 (265, 266, 268, 270) (FB). — "The substantial question in this appeal is whether (1907) 30 Mad 367 was rightly decided by this Court. The appellant contends that the decision conflicts with the judgment of the Privy Council in (1896) 23 Cal 775 and therefore cannot be allowed to stand . . . They (i e, the learned Judges who decided 30 Mad 367) did not, however, make any reference to the judgment of the Privy Council in 23 Cal 775 Presumably it was not brought to their notice . . . We consider that the present case is governed by the decision of the Privy Council in 23 Cal 775 "

(1941) 28 A. I. R. 1941 Madras 898 (902) = I L. R. 1942 Mad. 271 (278) (FB). — "The decision in (1894) 7 Mad 255 was criticised by Ayling and Sheshagiri Iyer, JJ, in (1917) 5 M L W 158 On the other hand, it receives support from the judgments given by Madhavan Nair and Stodart, JJ, in (1936) 71 M L J 511, by Cornish, J. in (1937) 71 M. L. J 725 and by Ramesam and Jackson, JJ, in A I R 1923 Mad 120 It is, however, significant that in these cases no reference was made to the decisions in (1907) 30 Mad 26, (1909) 32 Mad 420 and (1917) 5 M. L. W. 158 "

A. I. R. Commentaries Judicially Noticed.

(1945) 32 A I R 1945 Calcutta 298 (299) — The view that we are taking of civil procedure is supported from the decision of all the other High Courts and even from the civil procedure of the Allahabad High Court itself. These decisions are not in conflict with para 49 of Chitaley and Rao's Commentaries on the Code of Civil Procedure Vol 1 page 298. (Now see 4th Edn page 298.9)

Record of papers in Misl

No 2—Dated 23rd May 1876

From—THE COMMISSIONER, AJMER-MERWARA,

To—ALL JUDICIAL OFFICERS IN THE AJMERE-MARWARA DISTRICT.

Approved by the Judicial Commissioner, Ajmere, in his letter No 282, dated 20th May 1876

It having been found necessary to provide Rules for ensuring the safety of the different papers in a Misl, and for the preparation and security of the English portion of the Record, the Commissioner (with the assent of the Judicial Commissioner of Ajmere,) directs as follows —

English record to be of uniform size and on strong paper.

1 The English abstract of all cases—Criminal, Civil, or Revenue, Depositions of witnesses, and Judgment, must in every instance be written on English paper of uniform size, and in all important cases Foolscap paper should be used, as Serampore paper is soon torn, and becomes illegible on no account should Judgments ever be written on scraps of paper, or on the back of the Vernacular petition or order, as is now not unfrequently the case

Every sheet to be numbered and named in Vernacular as well as in English

2 On every sheet or separate paper, the number of the sheet, and the names of parties to the case, should be written in the Vernacular, as well as in English, the Heading of the Deposition should also distinguish whether it is that of the Plaintiff, Defendant, the Plaintiff's witnesses, or Defendant's witnesses

How to be attached to File

3 All English papers should be placed in full size without folding (as creases tend to tear the paper) between a cover of strong country paper, which should have the name of the Case and Court on it, in Vernacular, and they will then form a separate file of themselves, attached by string, however, to the Vernacular file, they should not be tied up indiscriminately with the Urdu papers, but should be separately strung together

Index of English as well as Vernacular papers to be prepared in Vernacular

4 An additional fly leaf is to be added to every Misl, containing an Index in Vernacular of the English papers, as well as the Vernacular papers, belonging to the Misl, to be signed by the Reader of the Court as correct, on which every Native Official through whose hands the files may pass, is to certify to the correctness of the Index

[Procedure—Miscellaneous

Record of papers in Miss

5 The Reader of the Court will not let the Misl pass out of his hands till the Record-Keeper or other Munshi taking it has certified the correctness of the Index which course will be followed by every succeeding Munshi who requires the Misl for any purpose

Each person through whose hands Misl passes to be responsible for its contents.

6 All the files of Original, Miscellaneous, and Appeal cases disposed of, should reach the Record Room within a month from date of disposal, and the practice that now obtains of keeping cases for a long time after decision must cease. The Presiding Officer of the Court will be held responsible for seeing this rule strictly carried out.

7 When an English Judgment is recorded, and one or both of the parties interested in the suit are natives, a Vernacular translation of such Judgment shall be put up and form part of the Record, the Officer presiding in the Court will be responsible (even if the translation is not made by himself,) that it shall be a correct and intelligible translation of the Judgment, and it shall not be placed on the Record, till it has been passed as correct, and signed by the Judge

8 In every Office if not already existing, an Official must be appointed as a responsible Despatcher and Receiver of files, who before despatch to or receipt from another Court, District or Division, will certify to the correctness of the Indices of Vernacular and English papers, immediately bringing to the notice of the head of the Office if any papers are missing. The last certifying Official will thus be made to feel his responsibility, and it is believed, the loss or fraudulent abstraction of papers will soon cease.

9 When records or papers are called for by an Appellate, Revision or other Court, a list of the files in Vernacular shall be prepared in the annexed form, and transmitted with the files to the Appellate or other Court.

Procedure—Miscellaneous]

Judicial Officers to note their Judicial powers

10 On receipt of the files by the Appellate or other Court, the proper Officer will check the list and if correct, note the date, and sign it with his initial, if incorrect, he will make a note of the error on the list, and lay it at once before the Appellate or other Court for orders

11 When the Appeal has been disposed of, the same list will be returned with files to the Lower Court. The Officer by whom the files were despatched in the first instance, will cause the list to be compared with the files received, and if correct will return it duly attested (as such to the Appellate Court to be filed with the records of the case to which it belongs as a receipt such receipt should be forwarded not later than the day after the file has been received

12 The despatching Officer should also satisfy himself, before transmitting the files that the papers entered in the Indices of the files are complete. It occasionally happens that files are received unaccompanied by the English Judgment, Arbitration Award, or some other important paper, if the course now enjoined be strictly followed, no such accidental losses, or fraudulent abstractions, can help being discovered at once, and the fault brought home to the responsible Official

No 240 J—Dated Ajmere the 22nd May 1886

To—ALL JUDICIAL OFFICERS IN THE AJMERE-MERWARA DISTRICT

The following instructions extracted from a Punjab Circular are issued for information and guidance —

It is often of importance to ascertain whether in a particular proceeding an officer has been exercising Civil or Criminal powers as well as the powers which he is competent to exercise. But the record frequently discloses no more than the name of the officer, or that he is a Tehsildar or an Extra Assistant Commissioner, titles which in themselves connote nothing as to the Civil or Criminal powers of the officer thus designated. Every proceeding of a Subordinate Court ought upon the face of it to disclose that the Presiding Officer is of competent jurisdiction and the capacity in which he

To—ASSISTANT COMMISSIONERS AND JUDGES SMALL CAUSES COURT—
AJMERE, BEAWAR, NASIRABAD

Dated 11th October 1889

It appears from inquiry that the rules for the destruction of Records published in the Ajmere Regulation Book have not been duly observed. Your attention to this omission is directed, and you are requested to represent what measures are now required to dispose of useless papers which have accumulated from not having been destroyed according to the Rules laid down.

2 For the future, to assist all offices in separating papers to be destroyed from those which are to be preserved, with reference to para 8 of Rule IX, page 1215 Ajmere Regulation Book, and para 3, Rule XIV, and with reference to all English correspondence which is not Judicial, the following rule is prescribed —

RULE Each office shall keep a rubber stamp on which the letter D shall be inscribed in large characters.

Before a letter is submitted for orders to the head of the office it shall be stamped D in red ink, if its destruction is permissible under the Rule, or in the case of non Judicial records if it does not appear necessary to preserve it for more than three years. The head of the Office will thus have an opportunity of seeing if it has been rightly stamped D, and all records so marked can easily be separated from files by any subordinate clerk when the time for destroying them arrives.

They must, however, be destroyed in the presence of a responsible Officer, who need only see that they are marked D without examining their contents and Rule XVII which enjoins a note being made of every record must not be overlooked. When the record to be destroyed has been entered in any register, the note of its destruction should be made against such entry.

3 The object of this Rule is to insure the exercise of proper discretion in the destruction of documents, and to admit of such destruction being carried out by inferior clerks with the minimum expenditure of time and trouble.

4 The Rule is not intended to supersede or interfere with any of the Rules in the Regulation Book.

The office of the Divisional Engineer is to be the office of record of all correspondence of the Commissioner either with the Local Administration with the Superintending Engineer with the Examiner Public Works Accounts or with District Officers or Councils or with other Officers and Departments in matters relating to Public Works generally.

(4) The Commissioner however will address the Local Administration under his own signature.

The Superintending Engineer will address the Executive Engineer direct on professional matters but the covers will be addressed to the Commissioner as a rule or if the Commissioner so desires.

This is a matter of office detail. It is to be understood that the Divisional Engineer shows all correspondence to the Commissioner and will dispose of all business in such manner as the Commissioner may from time to time direct.

The Assistant Commissioner is held jointly responsible with the Executive Engineer for the state of all roads buildings and tanks within his district. No Assistant Commissioner should be relieved of any responsibility until he can show that he has reported in due time any want of attention on the part of the Public Works Officers to the duties of maintaining the works in his district.

The projects should be arranged in the list in the order of their importance, and the list should be accompanied by papers explaining the necessity for each work and giving a rough plan and estimate of cost for each work.

19 Such proposals as are approved by the Local Administration will be duly communicated to the Commissioner through the Secretary in the Public Works Department, and at the same time the necessary instruction for the preparation of the detailed Plans and Estimates will be issued.

52 The classification to be observed in the preparation of estimates is to be found in Appendix VI of Public Works Code, Vol. 2. To ensure uniformity of classification the headings of the estimates for works and repairs and their abstracts should show distinctly the division, district fund class, main-head and sub-head (and where necessary the project of which the work forms part) to which the estimate relates.

53 Estimates for repairing unmetalled roads need not be of an elaborate character; it will suffice to state the width of each road, its general condition whether it be a hill road or road in the plains or partly one and partly the other with the proposed rate for repairs per mile, for each class of road.

 FUNDS

Section IV

54 It is a fundamental rule that no outlay is to be incurred on any work without a due allotment of funds.

55 Applications for allotments of funds should be submitted as soon as possible after the 1st April. These should be regulated not according to budget grants, but to bona fide requirements (provided for in the budget) for the year.

56 Anticipated lapses of funds should be reported to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department by the 1st October in each year at latest to admit of their utilization elsewhere.

57 The Local Administration alone has power to transfer funds from Original Works.

58 The allotments entered in the budget for any year for Original Works estimated to cost more than Rs. 2500 each cannot be utilized until the money has been assigned in a formal manner by the Local Administration in the Public Works Department. The applications for such assignments should be submitted separately for each work.

Public Works }

Provincial Rules

59 Applications for allotment of funds should be kept entirely distinct from references regarding estimates. For instance if an estimate for a work is submitted for sanction and funds are required at the same time a separate letter regarding the funds should be written.

60 A reserve from the Minor Works grant allotted annually in the budget for any year will be placed at the disposal of the Commissioner. When an appropriation for a minor work has once been made by the Commissioner, the Divisional Engineer will be held responsible that such budget appropriation is not exceeded. Such appropriation once made however, shall not be diverted to any other minor work except under the authority granting the original appropriation.

61 A list of works remaining incomplete on the 31st March of any year and which have not been entered in the budget of the succeeding year shall be submitted early in April and allotment of funds asked for to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department.

PETTY WORKS

63 A sum of money as a reserve for Petty Works will be placed from time to time by the Local Administration in the Public Works Department at the disposal of the Commissioner.

64 The Commissioner will sanction and allot funds (if available) up to the limit of his reserve for the construction of all Petty Works in his division costing less than Rs. 500. If the Commissioner's reserve is exhausted and the work is urgent, application for further funds should be made to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department. On no account must Petty Works be commenced in anticipation of allotment of the requisite funds.

AJMERE BEAWAR, NASIRABAD

Dated 11th October 1889

It appears from inquiry that the rules for the destruction of Records published in the Ajmere Regulation Book have not been duly observed Your attention to this omission is directed, and you are requested to represent what measures are now required to dispose of useless papers which have accumulated from not having been destroyed according to the Rules laid down

2 For the future, to assist all offices in separating papers to be destroyed from those which are to be preserved with reference to para 8 of Rule IX, page 1215 Ajmere Regulation Book and para 3 Rule XIV and with reference to all English correspondence which is not Judicial, the following rule is prescribed —

RULE Each office shall keep a rubber stamp on which the letter D shall be inscribed in large characters.

Before a letter is submitted for orders to the head of the office it shall be stamped D in red ink, if its destruction is permissible under the Rule, or in the case of non Judicial records if it does not appear necessary to preserve it for more than three years The head of the Office will thus have an opportunity of seeing if it has been rightly stamped D, and all records so marked can easily be separated from files by any subordinate clerk when the time for destroying them arrives

They must however, be destroyed in the presence of a responsible Officer, who need only see that they are marked D without examining their contents and Rule XVII which enjoins a note being made of every record must not be overlooked When the record to be destroyed has been entered in any register, the note of its destruction should be made against such entry

3 The object of this Rule is to insure the exercise of proper discretion in the destruction of documents, and to admit of such destruction being carried out by inferior clerks with the minimum expenditure of time and trouble

4 The Rule is not intended to supersede or interfere with any of the Rules in the Regulation Book.

Public Works]

Provincial Rules

10 The responsibility enjoined on Assistant Commissioners and District Councils in the last para is administrative. Generally speaking interference in professional matters would be confined to bringing to the notice of the Superintending Engineer any views they may hold in respect of the mode of carrying out the work

11 When an Estimate is sanctioned and with the exception contemplated in the last para the responsibility for carrying out the work will rest with the Divisional Engineer

12 When an Estimate which the Commissioner has power to sanction should in the opinion of the Executive Engineer be referred for professional opinion to the Superintending Engineer he will record his opinion to this effect in the report to the Estimate

13 On completion of a work a report in the usual form called a completion report will be submitted to the authority for whom the work has been constructed by whom it should be countersigned and return to the Divisional Engineer

14 All applications or requisitions for works required to be executed under these rules must be submitted through the Commissioner

CHAPTER III

PROCEDURE IN REGARD TO WORKS

SECTION I—Administrative sanction preparatory to entering upon projects

15 Administrative sanction by the Local Administration must be obtained before any project for works the cost of which will exceed Rs 500 can be entered on. Without such administrative sanction no detailed Plans or Estimates need be prepared

16 All proposals for works requiring sanction under the foregoing rules must be submitted to the Commissioner of Ajmere and Merwara

17 To ensure regularity in the conduct of business it is considered expedient to restrict the submission of ordinary applications for administrative sanction to a certain fixed period of each year an expediency based on both Administrative and Financial grounds, as facilitating the selection of schemes for early consideration both with regard to the relative importance of the proposed works and the limit of the available resources.

[Public Works

18 An annual list of schemes for administrative sanction should therefore be submitted between the 1st January and 1st of May of each year. The projects should be arranged in the list in the order of their importance, and the list should be accompanied by papers explaining the necessity for each work and giving a rough plan and estimate of cost for each work.

19 Such proposals as are approved by the Local Administration will be duly communicated to the Commissioner through the Secretary in the Public Works Department, and at the same time the necessary instruction for the preparation of the detailed Plans and Estimates will be issued.

20 Should, however, any proposals for Administrative sanction be justified by really urgent necessity, the Local Administration will receive and consider them at a time other than that prescribed above.

21 Proposals for Irrigation new projects or extensions or alterations to existing Works requiring Administrative sanction under these rules should in addition always be accompanied by a report by the Revenue Officer concerned of the estimated Direct and Indirect revenue to be expected.

SECTION II—PROCEDURE IN SUBMISSION OF PROJECTS

Original Works

22 The e are classed as —

(i)—Major Works, or those which cost Rs. 2,500 or upwards distinguished as

(a) Works costing more than Rs. 5,000, which require the sanction of the Local Administration in the Public Works Department.

(b) Works costing up to Rs. 5,000 which with the advice of the Superintending Engineer, the Commissioner may dispose of finally.

(ii)—Minor Works or those which cost Rs. 500, and not more than Rs. 2,500, which the Commissioner, advised by the Divisional Engineer, may dispose of finally.

NOTE.—Projects are usually initiated in the cold weather or camping season.

Public Works]

Provincial Rules

(iii)—Petty works, which cost less than Rs 500, which the Commissioner may himself dispose of

23 Plans and Estimates under Chapter III, Section I, Para. 19 for works under class I (a) shall be submitted to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department for sanction, on receipt of which the project will be registered for inclusion in the next year's budget. Should, however, there be circumstances making it advisable that the work should be executed at once, these should be stated in sending up the project and application made for the necessary appropriation of funds under a separate letter

24 Plans and Estimates under Chapter III, Section I, Para. 19 for Works under class I (b) will be sanctioned by the Commissioner himself and be similarly registered for inclusion in the next year's budget, unless there be any work which circumstances make it desirable to put in hand at once, when the sanctioned project should be sent to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department for the requisite appropriation of funds

25 Plans and Estimates for Works under class II will be sanctioned by the Commissioner, and be registered for inclusion in the ensuing year's budget, or if there are circumstances which make it desirable to carry out the work at once he should explain them in an application to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department for an appropriation of the requisite funds

26 The powers delegated to the Commissioner under class III do not extend to Imperial Works, such as Military, Postal and Telegraph to these as well as to "Tools and Plant," provided for in the Imperial budget, the Public Works Code Rules will apply

27 (1) No work shall be commenced until sanction to it has been accorded, allotment of funds made and orders for its commencement issued by competent authority

(2) In cases of emergency when the Divisional Engineer considers that the stability of any work will be endangered by delay, the Commissioner may, with or without the advice of the Superintending Engineer, authorize any necessary precautionary measures to be carried out reporting his proceedings at the same time for confirmation

Note—For works under classes I and II, Administrative sanction must first be obtained

[Public Works*Provincial RulesMUNICIPALITIES

28 Where not otherwise provided by Regulation the Rules in regard to power of sanction of Municipal Committees are as follows —

- i — If the Estimates do not exceed Rs 2 500 the Committee can sanction them on the advice of the Divisional Engineer who shall always sign the Plans and Estimates in token of approval
- ii — If the Estimates exceed Rs 2 500 and do not exceed Rs 5 000 they will be sanctioned by the Commissioner on the advice of the Superintending Engineer who will always sign the Plans and Estimates in token of approval
- iii — Estimates exceeding Rs. 5 000 will be referred to the Local Administration in the Public Works Department

REPAIRS

29 Repairs are either Ordinary or Special —

- (a) Ordinary Repairs are those of a periodical or recurring nature These do not require Administrative sanction
- (b) Special Repairs are such as involve any addition, alteration or renewal to the original design which is not due to ordinary wear or tear For these Administrative sanction is required under the same rules as for Original Works

30 The repairs for all classes of buildings and works are provided for in the General Budget of the Province, and the expenditure on them must necessarily be limited to the total sum allotted annually in the budget

31 Sanctioned estimates for periodical repairs of all kinds only hold good until the 31st March following, or in special cases until the 15th June

32 The Divisional Engineer should see that Periodical Repair Estimates embrace as much of the repairs required in each year as is possible so as to reduce the number of separate estimates and requisitions.

33 The Commissioner should satisfy himself that the Divisional Engineer or his subordinates inspect each building and road periodically in view to the Budget provision being made to bear due relation to real requirements and ensure all buildings being fairly maintained
